Mr. ELKINS. It was introduced yesterday, and it is already in the hands of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN], as chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, having been reported upon favorably by the Finance Committee this morning.

Mr. STONE. It has been referred to him?

Mr. LODGE. It has been referred to his committee. All such resolutions must be so referred.

Mr. ELKINS. I can not understand the celerity, the quickness, the dispatch of the Finance Committee overnight as against the painful consideration and slow methods of the Committee on Audit and Contingent Expenses of the Senate. [Laughter.] I am going to read this resolution, if the Senator from Massachusetts is through asking me questions.

Mr. LODGE. I only wanted to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the resolution reported from the Committee on Finance reads:

That there shall be appointed by the President of the Senate a select committee——

Mr. ELKINS. I know that.

Mr. LODGE. One moment—of seven Senators to investigate the cost of living and the prices of the necessaries of life and of articles in common use, both foreign and domestic——

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, I understand what that means. It means just what the Finance Committee want it to mean, nothing more. That is an easy way to sidetrack my resolution by adopting only about one-half of it.

Mr. LODGE. The resolution continues:

To ascertain, so far as possible, whether such prices have increased during the past ten years, and the cause or causes of such increase.

It is all there; and I can assure the Senator that there is no disposition to avoid the question on the part of anybody. That is merely the imagination of the Senator.

Mr. ELKINS. My resolution has slept the sleep of death for thirty days, and this one goes through the Committee on Finance in one short night.

Mr. GALLINGER (to Mr. ELKINS). But you did not send your resolution there.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator would send his resolution to the Committee on Finance, we would bring it in promptly.

Mr. ELKINS. I will send one to the Finance Committee in due season and see how long it stays there.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, when the Senator becomes a member of that committee he will get dispatch equal to that of the Senator from Massachusetts, but not until then.

Mr. ELKINS. If I were a member of that committee, I might get action; but I have never got anything from it, except the small drippings meted out to me in making up the tariff bill. I voted for nearly everything that was proposed by the Senator from Rhode Island to get what I did for my State.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. I advised the Senator from West Virginia while that bill was pending precisely how he could get all he wanted, and if he had done that he would have gotten it. I did that in a private way; but I am willing to put it in the RECORD. I told him then that if he were to serve notice on the Republican leaders that he intended to vote for the income-tax amendment to that bill he would get all he wanted. He did not do it, although he was persuaded in his judgment and his conscience that it was a righteous tax. Still, in order to keep the peace with the "powers that be" on the other side of the Chamber, he turned it aside and now he sees what he is getting. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELKINS. The next time I will consider the Senator's advice more carefully. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have had a great number of interruptions. I continue reading from the resolution introduced by myself:

If, in the judgment of said committee, such articles—

That is, the articles that enter into the cost of living—

have been increased in price by reason of legislation by Congress, or by any monopoly, combination, or conspiracy to control, regulate, or restrain interstate or foreign commerce in the supply, distribution, or sale of such articles, it shall report the same to the Senate.

As I heard the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts read, there was nothing about monopolies or trusts or combinations in it. I am willing, if the cost of living has been increased by monopolies or by trusts or by combinations or by the tariff, to ascertain the fact and let it be reported to the country. I do not want to dodge these issues, and I do not think the Republican party or the Republican leaders in the Senate ought to avoid them. I think they should meet them fairly and squarely. The people demand a full, fair, and impartial investigation, not a restricted one, not into some of the alleged causes of the high cost of living, but all of them.

The Senator's resolution does not meet the issue as it should. It leaves out several important factors.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, if the Senator will read——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. ELKINS. Yes.

Mr. ALDRICH. If the Senator will read the resolution reported this morning from the Committee on Finance, he will find it much broader than his resolution and that it includes many more subjects. It includes any possible cause which may exist to increase prices or increase wages.

Mr. ELKINS. Let us see if it says anything about monopolies or combinations or legislation by Congress. Why are these words left out and covered only by general clauses or terms?

Mr. ALDRICH. I believe the Senator from West Virginia is or was a lawyer, and he will understand the rule that reciting one cause may be held to exclude all the others. In the resolution reported we include all causes. So far as I am concerned, I would be willing that the Senator should put into this resolution just as many causes as he sees fit. There is no disposition on my part to dodge any investigation which may be made in regard to this matter.

Mr. ELKINS. I am glad to hear that acknowledgment from the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ALDRICH. It did not need acknowledgment on the part of the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. ELKINS. Then I am glad none was needed.

Mr. ALDRICH. I never had any such idea, and I have none now. The resolution reported by the Committee on Finance, I repeat, is much broader and more comprehensive than that offered by the Senator from West Virginia. If, however, he desires to specify certain matters of inquiry, I am sure there will be no objection on anybody's part to their being inserted.

Mr. ELKINS. I still do not find anything in the resolution about trusts, combinations, monopolies, or conspiracies to control, regulate, or restrain interstate or foreign commerce.

While I may understand what the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Massachusetts mean, the great public will not; it will reach the conclusion the Senate wishes to avoid those questions.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator from West Virginia will permit, I will venture to suggest to him that when this resolution or when some resolution shall be reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, it will then be competent for the Senator from West Virginia to offer amendments to it, if he chooses, and, if a majority of the Senate agrees, to put into the resolution such language as the Senator thinks ought to be added to it and will accomplish his purpose. He can not be foreclosed from offering his resolution as a substitute, if he wishes, for any resolution that may be reported from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not spell anything out of the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from New Hampshire. I do not see how they are pertinent. I have got certain rights, say, a long way off. I know some of my rights—I do not, however, know them all as well as the distinguished Senator does—but in due season I will try to get my rights and the rights of the people, stand by, and defend them. I shall make a statement hereafter.

I admit that the Finance Committee, which reported the resolution this morning, has made certain additions to the resolution as introduced, but I do not see the necessity of taking it from me by keeping it in committee. I know the other side discredits me as a protectionist, but I did not think the Finance Committee did, and was afraid to let my resolution pass. I do not know what it all means; but, Mr. President, the country will take notice of this. We can not impose upon the intelligence of 80,000,000 people; we can not deceive them, and we should not try. A great many people believe that these monopolies, trusts, conspiracies, and combinations in restraint of trade have contributed to this disastrous condition in the increased cost of living.

Mr. BAILEY. And that the tariff contributed to the monopolies and trusts.

Mr. ELKINS. I do not say that. Mr. President, I thought that I was answering the question of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] when I rose to show, as I think I ought to do, the difference between these resolutions. I have taken up more time of the Senate than I wished, but I had to answer the questions that were put to me.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator from West Virginia seems to have given a great deal of attention to this subject, as he does to all subjects in which he is interested. Perhaps he will be willing to state to the Senate whether he thinks prices have been increased by the tariff or by the trusts. Perhaps he has already made up his mind upon that subject, and can tell us what he personally thinks about it—whether the tariff is responsible for the increased prices and the increased cost of living, or whether the trusts are responsible. Perhaps he already knows something about the subject and may be willing to state now to the Senate what he thinks about it.

Mr. ELKINS. In order to get my resolution reported and acted upon I am not called upon to give my opinion. Later on I may. That is what I wanted the committee selected for. I wanted it to get that information; and I did not think there would be any objection to it. Indeed, I am surprised that any Senator should oppose the resolution—substitute one in its stead and rush it through.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, there has been no objection on anybody's part; and so far as I am concerned—and I have no doubt so far as the Senate is concerned—the investigation into this subject should be made as broad and as comprehensive as possible. If the Senator from West Virginia or any other Senator wants any particular subject investigated, I am sure he will have a chance to have it investigated to his heart's content.

Mr. ELKINS. It does not seem so. I can not get my resolution reported when it is broader, more comprehensive, and fuller than the resolution reported overnight by the Finance Committee, while my resolution is still in committee.

But, Mr. President, all resolutions ought to have the same treatment at the hands of the committee and be reported promptly. If all these resolutions are not put to sleep in the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I will make known my views, if I have a chance, later on. The Senator wants me to answer his questions. I might put half a dozen questions to him now and take up the time of the Senate about various matters. Is he in favor of this or in favor of that? I want a fair chance at the hands of the Senate and the Republican party, that is all, for all the people of the United States, no matter what I believe individually, to know, if possible, the real causes of the alarming advance in the cost of living; and I do not think it wise in the Republicans of the Senate to restrict the investigation of this subject. What is to be gained by refusing action on a resolution introduced a month ago and rushing one through introduced yesterday, except it be to control the make-up of the committee of investigation to suit the Finance Committee?

Mr. STONE. But they are not willing——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. STONE. The Senator from Rhode Island said that the Senator from West Virginia could have any subject investigated by the proposed committee that he desired investigated, but I judge from the course of this matter that it is not desired by the Senator from Rhode Island or his Republican colleagues on the committee and others associated with him that the Senator from West Virginia should himself have any voice in making the inquiry. He can request the committee to do it, but he is not permitted to do it himself; and hence the resolution he offered is sidetracked by the introduction, through the Senator from Massachusetts, of another resolution of substantially the same kind, so that it may be reported here and a committee created leaving the Senator from West Virginia off.

I do not know the opinion of the Senator from West Virginia as to the subject-matter under discussion and embraced in the resolution; I do not know what he thinks about the tariff or combinations or trusts raising or reducing the prices of commodities; but I do think that, if it be not discourteous, what has been done to him is a manifest indication on the part of those who are seemingly in control of this business of lack of confidence in the attitude of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ELKINS. I absolve the Senator from Massachusetts and the Finance Committee for any intentional discourtesies in what has been done; but it does seem to me I have not had fair treatment in the desire of these Senators to control the investigation, I can not imagine for what purpose.

Mr. President, since yesterday and the introduction of the resolution by the Senator from Massachusetts, I have despaired of ever having anything to say or do about the investigation of the cost of living, although I introduced the first resolution calling for an investigation a month ago. The one I introduced I suppose will never see daylight, and as to the one that is substituted for mine, I will have nothing to say except as a member of the Senate in open session. I thought, when I introduced this resolution thirty days ago, that I might have something to say on the subject. I had definite ideas about the investigation, and I introduced the resolution in good faith to have an investigation. I made the language as broad as I could to cover all these questions and show to the country that the Senate was not afraid to investigate the tariff and monopolies and trusts and combinations. It seems the Finance Committee is determined to control this investigation, just as it did the tariff. Both Senators now agree that that was left out when the resolution of the Senator from Massachusetts was introduced.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely mistaken in his statement of facts. The words which were in the original resolution which was offered by the Senator from Massachusetts as to the causes have not been changed at all. The committee to be appointed will investigate the causes and report upon all causes. That, of course, includes trusts, the tariff, and everything else. If the Senator desires to specify when this resolution comes before the Senate—it is not before the Senate now at all, and this debate is entirely out of order in a sense, as it is proceeding by unanimous consent—but when the resolution is before the Senate, if it is not specific enough, I have no doubt the Senate will be very glad to put in specific cases or specific inquiries in reference to this matter.

Mr. ELKINS. This does not reconcile me to the action of the Finance Committee in taking charge of the investigation, when I introduced the first resolution on the subject. Such a proceeding is not usual or regular in this body.

I would have been through long ago if I had not been interrupted. The Senator says that the tariff should be one of the causes investigated. I am not prepared to admit as much as the Senator does in regard to his own child, the tariff bill. It was nearly his production in the Senate, for whatever he said, I think, controlled what went into the bill and what was left out.

Mr. President, I am apprehensive the action of certain Senators will not be understood. I picked up one of the morning papers, the New York Journal, I think——

Mr. KEAN. The New York American.

Mr. ELKINS. The American, I believe. I will not put this extract in the RECORD now. It has some references to my friend the Senator from Rhode Island and I do not agree with them at all. Nobody rivals me in admiration of him, his good qualities, his ability, and his intelligence. His leadership is able, though terrific and terrible at times, but I generally submit to it gracefully, as I have done on many occasions.

Amongst the questions asked by the American, in speaking of the extraordinary action of the Finance Committee, which is getting to be a very good administration paper of late and entitled to respect in the Senate, "Is it a tariff whitewash?" Why did that creep into the public mind overnight? "Is the resolution offered by the Senator from Massachusetts a tariff whitewash?" I will not read more of this article now, but there is an abundance of it. The country is alarmed. Here is a serious question. Thirty days ago I introduced, as I have said, in the best of faith, a resolution comprehensive and broad, providing for a committee of Senators, to be selected by the President of the Senate, to go into this subject, and up to this moment I can not get any action either by clamoring for action in open Senate or by persuasion of the chairman on Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate with all the smooth words I can command. I can not get it out of the pigeonholes of his committee. There ought to be some rule by which a Senator can get a bill or a resolution reported.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from West Virginia yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. ELKINS. I do.

Mr. BACON. The article to which the Senator alludes is very suggestive, and I hope he will read it now. He says he will not do it now, emphasizing "now." If he intends to do so at another time, I think this is the time, for if there is a suggestion as to a tariff whitewash, we would like to know it.

Mr. ELKINS. I think it will keep.

Mr. BAILEY. If the Senator will permit me, I want to warn the Senator from West Virginia again that he is sacrificing his opportunities in order to keep the peace over there. If the Senator from West Virginia becomes an insurgent rife he will get what is coming to him and to his State.

While I am on my feet, with the permission of the Senator, I want to express a difference of opinion with my friend the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. It was not that the majority distrusted the Senator from West Virginia that moved them to take this matter out of his hands; it was the very well-defined fear that they could not trust him to go around the tariff question. It was a belief in their minds that if the Senator from West Virginia finds the tariff responsible for any of these hardships and these high prices he will frankly say so, because the Senator from West Virginia has more than once exhibited an inclination to get off of that reservation over there. [Laughter.] I would not be very much surprised to see the Senator from West Virginia within the next fortnight in agreement with some of the most conspicuous and useful insurgents in this body. I think he is getting tired of belonging to the anarchists. I think he is getting ready to belong to the insurgents.

Mr. ELKINS. One word more, Mr. President, and only one. I could not get off the reservation during the consideration of the tariff. I was afraid to try. The distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] knows why. The Senate knows why. But now I have a little more sea room. I do not have to in order to get scant justice. I have some definite notions about this matter, and some definite notions about the rights of a Senator when he introduces a resolution in the Senate covering a question about which another Senator introduces a similar resolution and has it referred to his committee and reports it next morning. I have definite notions as to whether this is proper treatment. Had the Senator from Massachusetts or the Finance Committee conferred with me, and said it was desirable that he should be chairman of the committee on the proposed investigation, especially in view of the fact the Finance Committee dictated the tariff, I would have cheerfully yielded.

Mr. CLAY. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. ELKINS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. In other words, the Senator rather acquiesced in the statement made by the Senator from Texas that the Senator from West Virginia, in his conscience and judgment, approved of an income tax. He did not deny it. I am sure the Senator acquiesced in it. Now that the Senator has more liberty, and is not in slavery this time, I suppose he will be in favor, when this question shall come again, of a substantial revision of the tariff in regard to the sugar schedule. I am almost persuaded that the Senator's judgment and conscience were in favor of such a revision when our last tariff bill was passed.

Mr. ELKINS. I voted for the income tax. I need not give my reasons now. I was on the reservation. I do not have to stay there always. The tariff is considered only once in about six or seven years. Some Senators have freedom the balance of the time. I am somewhat in fear we will have no investigation. I do not know why this method and this procedure should obtain in respect to my resolution. I can not find out the reasons for this unusual course. I generally go to my friend, the distinguished Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], when anything is not going right, and I ask what is the matter. He generally puts me right, or he says—when the tariff bill is under consideration—"You had better keep right where you are, if you know what is good for you." [Laughter.] But, Mr. President, seriously, I do not believe that this whole proceeding is the kind of treatment that a Senator should have in the Senate of the United States.

Mr. GALLINGER. I call for the regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from West Virginia permit me to ask him a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Hampshire demands the regular order. The regular order is the introduction of bills and joint resolutions.

Mr. BACON. I desire to know what the Senator from West Virginia meant by having more water to swim in now.

COMPANIES ENGAGED IN INTERSTATE COMMERCE.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I move that the bill (S. 305) to regulate the issue of securities by transportation, telegraph, and telephone companies engaged in interstate commerce, for the purpose of better protecting the people against unreasonable rates and charges, now on the table, be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The motion was agreed to.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE.

Mr. DOLLIVER submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 166), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 166.

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry be, and is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee during the Sixty-first Congress, and to have the same printed for its use, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON MANUFACTURES.

Mr. HEYBURN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 164), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Senate resolution 164.

Resolved, That the Committee on Manufactures, or a subcommittee thereof, be, and the same is hereby, authorized to employ a stenographer from time to time, as may be necessary, to report such hearings as may be had on bills or other matters pending before said committee, and to have the same printed for the use of the committee, and that such stenographer be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

JOINT COMMITTEE ON REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. HEYBURN. I submit a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 167) was read, as follows

Senate resolution 167.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate is hereby authorized to purchase and furnish for the use of the Committee on Revision of the Laws the United States Supreme Court Reports with Digest and the Federal Reporter with Digest, to be paid for from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Under the statute the resolution will have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. A word of explanation, with the permission of the Senate.

The Committee on Revision of the Laws is not supplied with either the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States or the federal courts, and access to the library is very inconvenient. Any lawyer will understand that when you send for one book, it suggests that you send for others, and so on. It is an endless chain. It seems to me if any committee of the Senate, in addition to the Judiciary Committee, should have these law books in the committee room, it is a committee appointed for the purpose of revising the laws. I have purchased a number of law books, but this is rather a heavy contract. While I have these books in another library, I have them not here.

Mr. KEAN. Do I understand that this is a committee of the Senate?

Mr. HEYBURN. It is the committee appointed by the President of the Senate to act conjointly with the committee of the House.

Mr. KEAN. It is a joint committee, created by law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. It is a joint committee created by law.

Mr. KEAN. It is not a Senate committee.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, it is partly a Senate committee. That is rather a fine-drawn distinction. The House, I may say, has provided the House committee with these books and many others; with quite an extensive library. The Committee on the Revision of the Laws, which was a standing committee of this body until a few months since, may, or may not, have had these books. I do not know. I was not a member of it. I have been a member of the joint committee for some time, and have been working at a very great disadvantage. I think an appeal for the law books necessary for the work to be performed ought not to be rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The law requires that the resolution shall go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate before any action can be taken upon it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have no objection to its reference, but I want these books.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

Mr. ELKINS. I offer a resolution, and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Finance. I hope to have as speedy action on it as I had on the other resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 165) was read, as follows:

Senate resolution 165.

Resolved, That there shall be appointed by the President of the Senate a select committee of seven Senators, with authority to sit during the session of the Senate or during the recess of Congress, either as a committee or by a subcommittee, with instructions to make an exhaustive investigation into the cost of living and any increase in the same since 1900; to ascertain whether the price of the necessaries of life which enter into the general use and consumption of the people have since the year 1900 been increased; and if so, to ascertain the cause or causes which have influenced said increase. In making such investigation special attention shall be given by the committee to the subject of wages and income, and if the increase in the same has kept pace with the increase in the cost of living; increased price, if any, of such articles as meat, grain, provisions, rents, cotton, wool, clothing, lumber, coal, iron, oil, brick, and cement; stating in said report the price to the producer, the wholesaler or jobber, the retailer, and the consumer at which said articles included in the investigation by said committee were distributed and sold in the year 1900, and the price for their disposition and sale at the present time. It shall further be the duty of said committee to ascertain the cost of production of said articles and the cost of their distribution and sale when in the hands of the wholesaler or jobber and the retailer between the same periods. If, in the judgment of said committee, such articles have been increased in price by reason of the increased production of gold throughout the world and the expansion of the currency in the United States, or legislation by Congress, or by any monopoly, combination, or conspiracy to control, regulate, or restrain interstate or foreign commerce in the supply, distribution, or sale of such articles, it shall report the same to the Senate, with suggestions or recommendations as to the remedy to be applied to reduce the cost of living, and accompany its report with such bill or bills as will, in the opinion of the committee, correct and remove the cause or causes which have enhanced the price of said articles. Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to employ experts, administer oaths, take testimony, send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer to report its hearings, and to have such hearings printed.

And all necessary expenses to carry out the provisions of this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

H. R. 18364. An act to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the thirteenth and subsequent decennial censuses, approved July 2, 1909, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on the Census.

H. R. 18403. An act to repeal a portion of section 429 of the Revised Statutes of the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

H. R. 18813. An act to amend section 63 of the act of August 28, 1894 (28 Stat., p. 567), was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate resume consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is that offered by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. CARTER. Let the amendment be again reported for the information of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment will again be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, at the end of line 12, it is proposed to insert:

Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed, from time to time, by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2½ per cent per annum.

Mr. CARTER. I think the amendment as thus perfected is satisfactory.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I certainly can not vote for this amendment. Its provisions will enable this board to fix an arbitrary rate of interest that may be higher than the banks of a State would be willing to pay, and if they do, they can withdraw all the funds deposited in the banks of that State and invest them in any way they see fit. If the rate that prevails in some other State should be 3 or 3½ per cent and the board should fix that as the rate, then that would be the standard rate throughout the Union, and it would permit this board in that way to get control of this enormous fund, to be used in investments, and it would nullify the very purpose which the Senator from Utah had in mind in offering his original amendment.

Mr. CARTER. It seems to me the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska, providing that the rate fixed shall be uniform throughout the United States, would, taken in connection with this condition, remove any such possible contingency. If the rates were to be regulated in the respective States according to the wishes of the board, I can conceive it might be that the rate would be fixed too high in some States, but if the rate is required to be uniform throughout the States and Territories, I can not imagine that the board would ever so raise the rate as to liberate all the money from the banks and bring about such a condition as would prevent the banks accepting the money. There must be some flexibility about the rate charged. We certainly must have at least 2½ per cent in order to pay the interest and likewise meet the obligations incident to administration. I think the bill taken altogether would clearly indicate to the board that it was the purpose of Congress to have such a rate as would meet engagements under the bill and no greater rate. If we should fix a maximum it would probably have to be fixed too high, and the maximum at 3 per cent, if named, might impel the board to reach the rate of 3 per cent independent of the necessities of the case. But if the rate is fixed at a minimum of 2¼ per cent and is made uniform in all the States and Territories, and it appears on the face of the bill itself that it is not a profit-making adventure, but only an addition to the Postal Service, for the accommodation of the people, there certainly could not be such a construction placed upon the whole act and the two amendments—the one pending and the other to be proposed—as would warrant the board in raising the rate of interest to a point where the banks would refuse the money.

Mr. BRISTOW. May I ask that the proposition, which has not been read, may be read for the information of the Senate?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Nebraska has the amendment written out, and I will ask him to read it.

Mr. BURKETT. On page 5, line 19, after the words "per annum," the amendment as prepared proposes to insert these words:

> Which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

Mr. BRISTOW. Then, with that amendment incorporated, which I understand is acceptable to the committee, there will be a uniform rate of not less than 2¼ per cent, which will prevail throughout the Union.

Mr. CARTER. That is the effect of the amendment, and the amendment is acceptable.

Mr. BRISTOW. It seems to me there ought to be some limitation. I grant that the argument of the Senator from Montana is forcible when he states that the board would hardly increase the rate to an amount that would result in the withdrawal of these funds, taking into consideration the phraseology of this bill and the manifest intent of Congress. But, nevertheless, it seems to me there ought to be some provision or declaration in the bill indicating that it is the purpose and desire of Congress that this money shall be left in the banks; and I fear that the last two lines of the amendment of the Senator from Utah throws the field wide open for a withdrawal of these funds, the very thing we have been seeking to avoid here since the discussion began.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana as to the advisability of a declaration in this bill that it is the intention that the board shall simply make a rate that will cover the interest and cost of administration.

Mr. CARTER. I see no objection to that, providing the phraseology is so framed as to leave such reasonable flexibility as may be necessary to avoid hampering administration. For instance, a declaration that it is not the purpose of Congress, by or through this measure, to make any profit for the United States. There might be a profit, and there will at times be a profit to the postal revenues received from the operations of this bill. At other times there may be a corresponding loss. If the rates were so adjusted in the rigid terms of the law as to prevent the board charging enough interest at any time to meet contingencies, then the board might find itself very greatly hampered, and the law would be rendered inefficient. A declaration that it is not the intention of the United States to make this a profit-yielding measure for the postal revenues or the Treasury would, I take it, construe the bill according to its true intent.

Mr. JONES. I think there should be some declaration of that kind, because I understand that is the policy of the bill. I do not think the board, however, ought to be restricted, so that there might not be any profit in a given year, but it should be so arranged that one year with another there should not be a profit made out of this business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PILES in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

Mr. BRISTOW. Let me inquire of the Senator from Montana if, at the end of the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, there could not be added a phrase something like this:

> Which rate shall not be less than 2¼ per cent per annum and not more than an amount sufficient to provide amply for the expenses of maintaining this system.

Mr. CARTER. Whether "expenses" would include interest charges I do not know. Probably the interest charge might be considered an expense. I will say to the Senator that the general idea of his amendment is proper enough, according to my view. If it is clear to his mind and the mind of the Senate that the term "expenses" would include the interest to be paid to the depositors at the post-offices——

Mr. BRISTOW. I hardly think that——

Mr. CARTER. "Expense and interest."

Mr. BULKELEY. Would it not be well to insert "expense and interest?"

Mr. CARTER. "Expense and interest." That, I think, would make the matter more clear.

Mr. BRISTOW. That would be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest, however, that the amendment would come in better where the rate of interest is provided—that is, the rate of 2 per cent payable to the depositor in the post-office—better than to have it follow the amendment offered by myself.

Mr. BURKETT. Yesterday when I had the floor the Senate will recall that I suggested the putting in of an amendment in line 19, on page 5. There is the place where it seemed it ought to come in, if we are going to put in such a provision—that is, to insert, after the words "at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum," the words "nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses of the system herein established."

Mr. SMOOT. That is the proper place, if the amendment is going to be inserted.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah be first disposed of.

Mr. BURKETT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BRISTOW. Now, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska to offer the amendment he has just suggested.

Mr. BURKETT. After the words "per annum," in line 19, on page 5, I move to insert:

> Nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses of the system herein established.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest "to meet the expenses of the system and interest charges."

Mr. BURKETT. It seems to me that interest is one of the expenses. I think that is included.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator send his amendment to the desk, that the Secretary may read it?

Mr. CARTER. While the Senator is preparing the amendment I request unanimous consent that the following table be printed in the RECORD. It shows the number of postal money-order offices in each State and Territory, separated into presidential and first-class post-offices, in operation July 1, 1909. The number of postal money-order offices has been increasing. January 8, 1910, the number was 51,824. From this table each Senator can determine the number of presidential offices and likewise the number of fourth-class offices in the money-order issuing class, and also the total of both.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Montana if the table shows the number of money-order offices and the stations from which money orders are issued, but belonging to the same general post-office? I understand there are not 51,000 separate and individual offices that are money-order offices, but that figure includes the stations as well as the main offices in the total. Does that appear in the table?

Mr. CARTER. It does not appear in the table. I am not aware of the basis upon which the table was prepared by the department, so I am unable to answer the Senator's question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana that the table be printed in the RECORD?

There being no objection, the table was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BURKETT. I now offer the amendment I suggested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska.

The SECRETARY. On page 5, line 19, after the words "per annum," insert the following:

Nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the word "is" be stricken out and the words "may be" inserted, with the permission of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BURKETT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska modifies his amendment by striking out "is" and inserting "may be." The question is on agreeing to the amendment as modified.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, before I vote on the amendment I should like to inquire of the Senator from Nebraska whether he has taken into account the possible contingency of losses by failures of banks in which these deposits are made. It seems to me that the suggestion of the Senator from Washington, to wit, a declaration that it is not the purpose of this act to make it a matter of profit to the Post-Office Department or to the Government is quite as good as this amendment. While I do not want to object to the amendment, I should like before I vote on it to know what the Senator from Nebraska will say about it.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator from Vermont very frankly that the first part of the amendment as I have now drawn it is very questionable in my mind. I really have some apprehensions with reference to our adopting it. It was suggested to me yesterday in practically this form by the discussion which was precipitated on the amendment of the Senator from Utah, which has just been adopted. Then, resulting from the discussion this morning, I joined it with the other provision making the rate uniform. I rather doubt whether we ought to throw about the department any limitations as to the maximum, but we should leave that rather to the conditions of commerce and trade. I rather doubt whether it would not be well if there comes a time when the United States can serve itself with this money, both from the income standpoint and the standpoint of taking care of some of its own bonds, perhaps, that it should be able to do it. However, it seemed to be the concensus of opinion that this sort of an amendment should go in, and that there should be that limitation, and I am not greatly averse to it.

In reply specifically to the question the Senator from Vermont has asked, I think there are more words even in this amendment as I offered it than it is necessary to include. I think the words "expenses" alone would have included not only the 2 per cent that is going to be paid to the individual for his deposit in the post-office, but that it would have included the running expenses, the going expenses of the postal system, and it would have included as a part of the going expenses whatever may be lost here and there in the banks.

When the department takes up the question of rates, one of the questions they will have to consider will be, first, what are the ordinary expenses going to be for the additional clerical help, the blanks, the printing, and all those things? Then they will have to make a calculation as to what the probable loss may be, and they will have to calculate that. They will have to add enough to the 2 per cent to cover all the expenses of the system. The word "expenses," in my judgment, would cover the 2 per cent interest that is to be paid. That is a part of the expenses of the system. It would cover whatever loss there may be in the banks, for that is certainly a part of the system. It would cover the running, clerical expenses of the system, and that sort of thing, and by using that word alone we would not tie up the department in the way I suggested.

If we would strike out the words "and interest," in my judgment it would be abundantly provided for. I am not certain, I will say, but that we sometimes put in too many words. I have even more doubt of its covering the exact point the Senator has suggested after putting in the words "and interest" than if you left in simply the word "expenses." When you go to specifying and detailing what the provision is going to mean there may something come in that is not covered. The word "expenses," by any reasonable interpretation, would include every item of expense, loss, clerical help, interest, and all.

As I said, I would rather risk it with just the word "expenses" than to add even the words "and interest;" but it seemed to be wise to add those words. I wanted to get the amendment in a form that would be acceptable; and I thought there would be plenty of time to think over it after we got it in print, and therefore I accepted it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, day before yesterday I offered an amendment to section 8 in the way of a substitute for it. It was really the pending amendment yesterday, but the Senate by common consent considered the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], that has just been disposed of. In order to make the record entirely clear, I withdraw, with the consent of the Senate, the substitute which I offered day before yesterday, and propose the following amendment to section 8.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn and the substitute therefor will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "banks," in section 8, page 5, line 15, down to and including the word "surplus," in line 21, and to insert:

Whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum if there is more than one such bank in any city, town, or village willing to take such deposit upon the terms provided for herein, the same shall be divided among them substantially according to their capital and surplus. If no one of such banks in any such city, town, or village is willing to accept the deposits upon such terms, or if there be no bank or banks therein, or if the post-office at which the funds are received is not in a city, town, or village, then the deposit shall be made in a solvent bank or banks subject to such supervision and examination of the State or Territory in which the post-office is situated, giving preference to those that are in the same general community as the post-office receiving the funds.

Also strike out from and including the word "Provided," in line 18, on page 6, to and including the word "depositories," in lines 22 and 23.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, this amendment, or these amendments, are in substance and, it may be said, in words precisely like the substitute that I offered for the entire section, the only difference being that I have adopted the language of the original section in so far as it was possible to do it and preserve the changes that I intended to make. These amendments have been considered, I believe, by the Senator in charge of the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator suspend for a moment? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair will lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from New Jersey? The Chair hears none, and the unfinished business is temporarily laid aside without prejudice. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. These amendments make two changes in the section. First, they render it more certain that the money coming at the post-office of a particular city, town, or village shall be deposited in the bank or banks of that city, town, or village, and if there be no such bank or banks there, then in the neighborhood or in the general community. I believe it to be in exact harmony with the spirit of the bill as reported. I understand the Senator in charge of the bill has no objection to the adoption of this amendment.

The second change is to eliminate from the section the provision which requires 10 per cent of the entire deposits throughout the United States to be kept in the Treasury of the United States or in some bank as a reserve fund.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the Senator if he will not substitute the word "permitted" for "required," merely permitting the board to keep this reserve in the banks or in the Treasury not exceeding 10 per cent?

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not quite catch the suggestion.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator stated that the reserve referred to in the proviso is required to be kept in the Treasury at Washington.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or in the banks.

Mr. CARTER. Or in the banks. The bill merely permits it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will correct my reference to the bill to that extent. The language of the bill is that the board shall be permitted to do so if it sees fit; but those four lines are stricken out in this amendment. I understand the Senator in charge of the bill has no objection to that change.

The amendments made by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] I find are contained in that part of section 8 which I seek to strike out, but I am sure there will be found a way in which the text of my amendment can be amended or a way in which the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska can be preserved even though the text be changed as I have suggested.

Mr. BURKETT. I think, as I have listened to the reading of the amendment, that if it shall be adopted I can insert my amendment after the provision for the minimum rate of interest. I will want to do that after the amendment has been voted on, if it shall be adopted.

Mr. CARTER. It was intended to make the text of the bill on page 5 in the particulars referred to quite sufficient to accomplish the purpose manifest on the face of the text. I have no objection to any language which will make that purpose more definite if it is at all questionable. I doubt if this amendment does make the text more clear, but the Senator from Iowa, after mature consideration, thinks it more specific and that it will accomplish the purpose with greater certainty. I therefore accept the amendment, adding, of course, the insertion therein of the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska. I presume by unanimous consent the amendment which was heretofore adopted in that portion of the text can be inserted in this amendment.

Mr. BURKETT. Then, I ask to perfect the amendment in line 7 by inserting after the words "per annum" the words of the amendment which I offered and which was adopted a moment ago.

Mr. CUMMINS. I accept that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the insertion requested by the Senator from Nebraska will be made. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. Now, the question is on the other amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa has also offered another amendment, which will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, on page 6, strike out from and including the word "Provided," in line 18, down to and including the word "depositories," in lines 22 and 23.

Mr. CARTER. In view of the other amendments adopted that amendment is eminently appropriate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before it is voted on, let me inquire whether there is any other provision which requires a reserve.

Mr. CARTER. There is. The entire deposit in the banks is subject to check at all times, and constitutes a reserve for immediate use.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is all right, then.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINS. I gave notice at the time I proposed the amendments just adopted that I would offer an amendment to section 7, which I now do.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. In section 7, on page 5, line 7, after the word "prescribe," insert:

Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State in which the depositor withdrawing resides, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor resides.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think it will be granted on every side that this amendment is necessary in order to carry out the spirit and effectuate the purpose of the amendments already adopted.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask that the amendment be again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again read the amendment.

The Secretary again read the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. It seems to me that the language might be simplified, if I may be permitted to have the amendment a moment. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that it should read:

Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor resides.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Hampshire suggests, without any change in the meaning, that the language might be shortened by putting it in this way:

Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor withdrawing resides.

Mr. BURKETT. Let me ask a question which occurs to me. I am not so familiar as I might be with all the provisions of the amendments the Senator from Iowa offered, but it seems to me we are liable to get this tied up so that we can not do any business under it in our anxiety to do what we all want to do, of course, and that is to keep the money in the State where it comes from. Take the amendment now before us for an example. Suppose there is not any money in the banks of a State—I take an extreme case—where the banks have not accepted the money. Then, as to the money which under the provisions of the bill is invested somewhere else, how will you pay those withdrawals?

Mr. GALLINGER. There will be no withdrawals nor any money.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator mean, if the moneys that have been gathered at the post-offices have not been deposited in that State and have gone elsewhere?

Mr. BURKETT. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. The possibility is so remote that I think it is hardly necessary to provide for it.

Mr. BURKETT. I said I used the most extreme case, of course, but there might be all grades of it. You may get into trouble if you just provide for a certain place for withdrawals to be paid from. I can not see any great danger myself in rather leaving that to the board. I understand, of course, that the object is to keep the money in the local banks among the people where it originates, and in that I coincide; but it seems to me that unless there is some saving clause somewhere, this provision might make trouble. As I said, I am not familiar enough with the provisions of the other amendments submitted by the Senator from Iowa to know just what this amendment might result in.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am sure that the contingency to which the Senator from Nebraska refers would never occur. If the Senator believes that it is so imminent that it ought to be provided for, I hope he will suggest an amendment in some appropriate part of the bill. This particular amendment is eminently right, because we all agree that we do not want the money which has been deposited in the banks in New England withdrawn for the purpose of paying the depositors in Iowa or in Utah; and, therefore, we ought to fix this in any event as we desire to have it, and make some other provision for the contingency feared by the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. GALLINGER. At this point I am going to suggest, and I think the Senator having the bill in charge will agree with me that it is well to do so, that at the conclusion of to-day's session the bill shall be reprinted with the amendments which have been agreed to, so that we will have it before us to-morrow.

Mr. CUMMINS. With the amendments in italics?

Mr. GALLINGER. Yes; with the amendments in italics, so that we will have it before us to-morrow in a shape in which we can understand it. Several amendments have been agreed to that I confess I have not carefully examined. Then, if it be found that we have made mistakes, we can correct them either before the bill goes into the Senate or after it reaches the Senate.

Mr. CARTER. The suggestion is so clearly appropriate, I now ask, fearing the matter might hereafter be overlooked, that at the close of the consideration of the bill for this legislative day the bill be reprinted with all amendments adopted in italics.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am quite willing to adopt the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, and I ask that the amendment I have offered be made to read as follows:

Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor withdrawing resides.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I can not help doubting the wisdom of that amendment. We know the experience of our public officers. I think they have been very careful in times past to withdraw funds from public depositories, even without any law regulating it, very equally and proportionately over the country. The Senator suggested that the proposition I made was the suggestion of a very remote danger, but I undertake to say that there will be some of the States in which the banks will not want to take money from the Government at the rate of interest at which it is going to be placed, which can not be less than 2¼ per cent. It probably will not be less than 2½ or 2¾ per cent. It is going to be uniform. That may be a small rate of interest in Iowa, Nebraska, Idaho, and other Western States, but it is a pretty high rate of interest in the Eastern States. I surmise that the time may come when it will be too high in some States, and the banks will refuse to pay that interest. They will not want the money. Under the provision which is in the bill, if that time does come, I want to know where you are going to get the money to pay the depositors. You have tied it up. I can not see any good reason for it. All through the bill we have put every safeguard against the centralization of this money or its being withdrawn unduly from any particular locality. There would not be any government official, after reading this law, who would be able to satisfy his conscience as a public official and not keep these funds as near by as he possibly could in the community where they are collected. It seems to me that this provision would tie it up so tight that the machinery might not work.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BURKETT. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I ask the Senator from Nebraska if he does not think this would remedy that sort of evil: Where this amendment provides that "withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State" to add the words "if there are sufficient deposits in said State?"

Mr. BURKETT. Of course something of that sort could be inserted, but it seems to me that the suggestion of the necessity for that only accentuates the difficulty in which we may find ourselves. I do not think the danger is sufficient to warrant us in adding this limitation or this restriction. It does not seem to me that the danger is probable enough that any public official, after this bill is written as it is, is going up into the banks in Vermont or out in Iowa to draw money to pay to depositors over in Nebraska or Oklahoma or elsewhere. I think we had better err on the side of keeping the machinery so that it will run practically than to restrict it so that we will get into the trouble we are likely to get into with that provision, in my judgment.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I am somewhat in accord with the views just enunciated by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT]. I am afraid, if we undertake to go into all the details of this bill, that the Treasurer of the United States and the officials in charge will say that the men who framed this bill knew as much about practical banking as Nicodemus is said to have known about the second birth. I believe the better way is to set forth the principles that actuate this body, if they can be set forth in some way that embraces all of the thoughts and ideas which have been enunciated by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]; to say that it is the purpose of this legislation that the money received on deposit in any State or community shall be deposited in the banks there, and leave the details so that they will work out easily and practically.

Now, let me make a suggestion which illustrates what I mean. I shall not be surprised if it would be found when we come to the practical workings of this bill, that it would be better that in the State of Iowa, for instance, there should be some central bank, perhaps at Des Moines, where this money would be deposited in little driblets by the postmaster; that it then be subdivided into even dollars, in round amounts, among the different banks of the State, so as to avoid this complex figuring of accounts—a half dollar, a dollar, or $5 at a time between the department and the little banks. I do not know that it is so, but I believe the whole spirit of this matter can be worked out in a way that will absolutely meet the ideas of the Senator from Iowa. I have no doubt that the men in charge of this matter—the trustees who will be appointed—will follow the spirit of whatever we adopt here in the execution of this law. I may be wrong; but I wish it might be the policy of Senators on this bill to leave the little details to the men who have the practical knowledge of how these matters should be worked out, assuring the Senator from Iowa, as I do, that I believe they all will work out exactly to his liking.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, if I looked upon this as a detail I should certainly yield to the assurances of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]. With me it is a fundamental, vital part of the measure. I can not for a moment think that the board that is created here would be animated by any other than upright and honest purpose; but we have had enough experience in our country with money that is subject to be placed here or there, at the pleasure of a government official, to be somewhat wary of committing this sort of discretion to any board. It has not been very long since one part of this country, with a great deal of unity of action, went to the Secretary of the Treasury and insisted that the money of the United States which was distributed all over the United States should be withdrawn from certain parts and concentrated in another part.

The Secretary of the Treasury had no other purpose than to do the thing which he believed would benefit the whole country. I do not want, however, a bill passed that in a time of stress and storm would enable this board, even if it believed it to be wisest for the country, to take money, which had been deposited in Iowa, and to remove it to New York by the payment of the depositors in New York, who were withdrawing, simply because the board thought that the business of the country and the necessities of the country required that New York should have the money or required that the money should not be drawn from the New York banks.

It involves a feature of the system which, as I think, is of vast importance; and I am not willing to allow that contingency to go unprovided for. I am perfectly willing to see inserted anywhere in the bill that if there is no money in the banks of the State in which the withdrawals are occurring, then the money may be taken from the banks of other States, although I regard that possibility as so remote that it need not give us the slightest concern.

The real point, however, is—and I shall feel compelled to insist upon it—that the withdrawals in any State or Territory shall be paid through the deposits or by deposits in the banks in that State or Territory. We can in that way preserve the purpose of the bill; there will be no danger attending it; and I can not conceive that it will in anywise restrict or hamper the board in the administration of the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am somewhat at a loss to know just how you are going to compel the banks to keep the money in any particular place, inasmuch as you, by another provision of the bill, give them the right to use it as though it were their own.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I assume that is a question directed to me.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. And I shall be very glad to answer it.

Of course, the moment the Government deposits this money—derived from the post-offices, if you please—in the banks, it ceases to be the Government's money. The Government simply becomes a creditor of the bank in which the deposit is made, and the bank can do whatsoever it pleases within the limits of its power with that money, just as it could do with the money deposited by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

It is assumed, however, that the banks will always keep themselves in condition to satisfy the demands of any depositor, whether it be the Government of the United States or whether it be the Senator from Idaho. This has no concern with the use of the money by the bank. It only declares—if I may be permitted to explain it, for the Senator from Idaho was not here when I came in—it only means that, if during the last month the savings depositors in Iowa were to call on the Government for a million dollars for the payment of their deposits, the Government would check or call upon the banks of Iowa in which it had deposits for that sum, and would not call upon the banks of New York or the banks of New England for that sum. That is the whole purpose and the entire scope of the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, it follows, of course, that those banks must at all times carry a reserve far in excess of that which they carry under ordinary banking transactions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on the contrary, if I were a banker, I should consider the deposits made by the Government—the postal savings fund—as much more likely to be permanent than the deposits of individual customers of the bank, because the experience of other countries has been that such deposits grow constantly for a great many years anyway after the institution of the system. While I believe it to be true that the law, so far as national banks are concerned, would require them to keep the same reserve for government deposits that they keep for all other deposits, yet these reserves would be much less likely to be called upon in the case of the Government than in the case of the individual depositor.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, Mr. President, I understand that it is not contemplated that any reserve whatever shall be carried by the banks because of these deposits.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, that is an error so far as the national banks are concerned, because the law applicable to the creation of reserves would be just as applicable to the government deposits as to any other deposits, and, of course, if a bank had a million dollars of government deposits, its reserve would necessarily be much larger than though it had not those government deposits.

Mr. SMOOT. The same thing applies to state banks, but that is because, under the law of the State, they are compelled to keep a certain reserve.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely, if the state law requires them to keep a reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. Unless some action has been taken during my absence from the Chamber, there is no provision that would cover this class of deposits—I mean no provision governing government deposits which would be applicable. These moneys are not declared to be public moneys, and so they go into the banks as private deposits unless some action has been taken since yesterday and during my absence, because when we were discussing this question yesterday it was conceded that these moneys were not declared to be public moneys.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, as I understand—and I am sure I am right about it—the law which requires national banks to maintain a reserve applies to all deposits, no matter whether individual or government deposits. This does not affect that law at all.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, if I recollect the law in regard to government deposits, where the banks are required to furnish collateral, as they are required to do now, they are not required to keep any reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the answer to the proposition?

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but this bill gives the bank the opportunity either to give indemnifying security or collateral. If the bank chooses to give collateral, then it would be precisely like any other deposit.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President, as I understand the propositions in this bill they practically place these deposits on the same level with ordinary government deposits. The banks are required either to give an indemnity bond or collateral for the postal savings-bank deposits, the same as for ordinary deposits of the Government, and the Senator from Iowa will realize that practically none of these funds will remain in the communities where they will be deposited in the postal savings banks. They will drift, with all the other funds of the banks of the West or the banks of the East, to the commercial centers of the country, where they will be used as they are used now. It is going to be a difficult task sometimes, it seems to me, for the board of trustees, if they are restricted to keeping deposits in every little bank in the country, to withdraw from those banks enough funds to meet the drafts in a particular place.

It occurs to me that it is not wise to tie up the details of administration in this legislation authorizing a postal savings-bank system. We must leave some of the details, even as we have done, to some board to provide some measure for the withdrawal of deposits.

It sometimes happens in this country that we have a dearth of currency in one section and not in another. It might be possible that in the good State of Iowa, with which my financial dealings have made me quite familiar, sometimes they have a dearth of currency with which the banks could meet drafts of this character, which might be made with but a moment's warning. We have had the same conditions in the East. So it seems to me we should leave some of these questions of administration to the discretion of the board. The Government is responsible for the funds that come into its hands, whether they are called public funds or funds of whatever character they may be. They are deposited with the Government, and the gentlemen who are named in this bill to act as trustees are merely carrying out a governmental policy. They are in charge of the fund, not as we have it in some departments of the Government, I am sorry to say, for we have now in the hands of the Bureau of Insular Affairs, and subject actually to the control of the distinguished military officer in charge of that department of the Government, and on deposit in the trust companies of New York almost exclusively, more than $12,000,000. You will find some allusion to it in the report of the Bureau of Insular Affairs. He requires collateral, but it is subject to the fluctuations of the market; and the vaults that contain those securities are opened day by day; and as they are disposed of by the banks that hold deposits other securities are substituted in their place as the market rises and falls.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I was attempting to develop the position. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BULKELEY] first observed it, but has drifted off into a wider question. I want to present this question in a concrete form. As I understand the law, the banks are not required to carry any reserves against secured funds now.

Mr. BULKELEY. I think the Senator is absolutely right on that question.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. The idea I started to develop was, that these funds were of such a character that the bank would not be required to carry any reserve to meet the drafts upon it, so that whatever reserves were held to meet these drafts would be the reserves that are held against another class of deposits. That would naturally follow. Suppose the Government has a million dollars of this class of funds in a bank, and ordinary depositories have another million dollars; the million dollars the Government has is secured under the provisions of this act by the deposit of collateral or such other security as is provided for. The other deposits are not secured at all, except by the reserve that the bank is required to carry. Here is a bank with two classes of funds, one of which carries a reserve and the other of which does not, and yet they may be drawn out under exactly similar circumstances.

Mr. President, I have before me this provision of the bill that is pertinent to be considered in connection with that thought. It will be observed that the amendment introduced by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], which, I understand, was adopted during my absence to-day, provides that the Government may not withdraw this money from the banks so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay interest for it. We give the banks the right to pay this money back or else stop the payment of interest, and we reserve no corresponding right to the Government. The Government can not withdraw it from the banks, except for limited purposes, and the Senator in charge of this bill, if I understood him correctly, has prophesied that the fund would never diminish, but that it would be a growing fund at least for some years.

The result is that if the bank serves notice upon the Government that it will no longer pay interest, it is no longer required to pay it, because the Government, though required to receive interest, can not withdraw it from the bank except for the contingency which the Senator in charge of the bill says will never arise. That is rather an anomalous condition of affairs. The Government can not withdraw it and thus save itself from paying interest under any condition that is likely to arise, but the bank at any time, according to the letter and the text of this amendment, which has been adopted, may relieve itself of the obligation of paying interest by serving notice upon the Government to take its money out.

Is that a businesslike transaction, where one side disarms itself from the right to recover its money and the other side is equipped with a weapon by which it may stop interest payment at any time? It does not seem to me that it is. I think something has been overlooked there. Take a bank, for instance, that has $100,000 on deposit, and, because of the financial conditions of the country, that bank knows, or thinks it knows, that the Government can find no other market for that money. It simply notifies them that after the day after to-morrow they desire that the money be drawn out, otherwise the interest will stop on it. What provision is there for that?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Government received notice from the bank to withdraw the money or, in other words, that they would not comply with the terms of this bill, then the board of trustees is authorized to withdraw that money from the bank and invest it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. Invest it in government bonds. The rate that the Government pays is only 2 per cent, and we have no government bonds drawing less than 2 per cent. I have no doubt that the Government to-day could, if it were a question of profit, make money upon the action of a bank that would take that position.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is rather a startling proposition. Government bonds in very large amounts are about as difficult to get sometimes as some other things.

Mr. SMOOT. The bill does not provide that it shall be confined to government bonds.

Mr. HEYBURN. No.

Mr. SMOOT. There are other securities that can be purchased.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Well, Mr. President, if you wanted to inflate the price of securities, all you would have to do would be to put the Government in the market as a buyer, and as a buyer under compulsion, as a buyer that must find a market for its money on the best terms possible, with a limitation as to the rate of interest to be paid.

I do not believe that any Senator or any number of Senators, after a reasonable consideration of that question, would advise a policy that would result in the placing of the Government in that position.

These will be large sums; they will not be petty and trifling sums; they will be counted by millions; and if the Government, pursuant to a notice from a bank that it will no longer pay interest, should withdraw a million dollars and go into the market with the avowed intention of buying the limited class of securities provided for in this bill, what would be the effect on the market price of those securities?

Mr. SMOOT. There would hardly be a million dollars in one bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, multiply your millions, for there will be hundreds of millions. I am only using it as a unit of consideration.

Mr. SMOOT. Not in one bank; and that is what we are talking about.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know. You might just as well talk about the complexion of the cashier of the bank as to attempt to divide a great principle by any such lines as that. The bank, so far as the deposit is concerned, is a unit, because the principle is a unit in its application to the sum total of deposits.

Mr. SMOOT. But that is no reason why all the banks in the country would act as a unit.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, it is not the policy of wise legislation to provide for conditions that might become dangerous. In conservative legislation we legislate only along lines that preclude the possibility of danger. If we are going to pass a law which, in the event of certain conditions, would be destructive of the interests of the people, we are on pretty reckless ground.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Let me suggest to the Senator from Idaho that, upon inquiry, I find that 5,069 national and state banks in the United States pay no interest at all on deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know that.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. This morning I was told at the Riggs Bank that they do not pay any interest on $7,000,000 of deposits. I think we may very appropriately consider what the alternative of the Government may be with a large fund in the event that it may not be needed by the banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very wise suggestion. I have been diligently inquiring for some weeks, or ever since this bill has been under consideration, as to the character and proportion of national banks that pay interest on deposits. I find that a very large majority of them do not, and I very seriously doubt the right of any of them to pay interest on deposits.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think every bank in the United States, including the Riggs Bank, in the city of Washington, pays interest to other banks on daily balances.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is another proposition.

Mr. CARTER. And on time deposits, also.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was not speaking with reference to the reserve. I asked the question whether they paid interest on deposits. They did not pay interest.

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly.

Mr. CUMMINS. What is the aggregate of all the deposits in the bank?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know; but I think there are in the neighborhood of seven or eight thousand national banks in the country, are there not? This shows that more than a majority of them——

Mr. BULKELEY. Probably twice that number.

Mr. CARTER. There are about 22,000 banks in all. I can tell the Senator in a moment the number of national banks.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Here are 5,000 banks that do not pay any interest.

Mr. CUMMINS. On individual deposits.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator from Michigan must certainly confine that statement to individual deposits. I doubt very much whether there are many national banks in this country that do not pay interest to other banks which deposit their money with them.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why would a bank——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would not dispute——

Mr. HEYBURN. Why would a bank bid for the deposits of the postal savings banks and pay for the use of the money when they can get all the money they want without paying interest? The conclusion is inevitable that the high class of banks that have sufficient money on hand for the transaction of all the business they can get would not be the ones which would receive it, and that the ones which would receive this money and be anxious for it are the class of banks having difficulty in getting credit.

Mr. SMOOT. In answer to that I may say that the strongest banks in the city of New York are to-day paying interest on deposits from western banks, and they have done so for years and years.

Mr. HEYBURN. For what purpose?

Mr. SMOOT. For the purpose of securing the deposits, and just exactly for the same purpose that they would pay interest under this bill—to secure the deposits from the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is the Senegambian, Mr. President, right there. The New York banks that pay high rates of interest for money to use on call would probably get all of it.

Mr. SMOOT. It is impossible——

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand the Senator's proposition exactly. If we are to stand here and legislate a system of government by which the money is to start on its course from every home and hamlet and business center in the United States toward the city of New York, I take it you will find no support for the measure outside of the city of New York and the sympathies that surround it.

Mr. President, that is just what would happen; and because of just such provisions as are obtained in this amendment, adopted this morning, by which the Government's hands are tied and not the banks'. The banks have the money when these conditions arise. They must have it before they arise. They have it, and the Government can only draw it under limited circumstances. That is the provision of this amendment. So unless they want to withdraw it for depositors they can not get it out of the bank at all.

Let us see if I am right about that. Here is the language of it. It is most astonishing:

That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act.

I suppose that means the expense of administering it.

It shall only be withdrawn for that purpose. It can not be withdrawn for the purpose of depositing it somewhere else. The Government can not withdraw it for the purpose of moving it from one money center to another. It can not withdraw it for the expenses of government. There is the situation as to the Government's relation to the money. It—shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed.

Investment. That refers to the bond investment. They can not withdraw it at all for transfer. The Government can not, but the banks which are made the custodians of the money may send it down the stream that ends at Castle Garden. Is that a wise provision of law, think you? Do you think the Government's interests are protected; do you think the depositors' interests are protected under a provision like that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senator from Idaho in favor of putting into this bill a provision that will determine how the banks shall use this money after it is deposited with them?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. If I put any provision into this bill, I would favor putting in a provision of safety; and as far as I would go would be that the Government should receive the money through its agencies in the post-offices and take it into its own custody and use it for its own purposes, if it paid interest on it, and hold it as a sacred fund to be invested in property and in things over which the Government had absolute control. That is as far as I would go. I will never be a party to legislation that contemplates the picking up of this class of money and putting it into the channels of speculation. I never would be a party to that. I never would be a party to making it the plaything for what are called "financiers."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If I may be permitted to make a suggestion to the Senator from Idaho, I will venture the assertion that the reserves in the national banks in the city of New York encourage speculation.

Mr. HEYBURN. There are two classes of reserves in the New York banks. There are the reserves that are held against the daily or recurring drafts of the bank that does business with the New York bank; what they call the correspondent bank. That is one class of reserves. Then there is the other class of reserves, which we discovered here a few months ago when we were discussing the last financial bill—the reserves which the outside banks send to New York, upon which they receive interest, which may be used by the New York banks for any purpose that occurs to them. Those are the two classes of reserves. I was not referring to the class of reserves carried against the daily balances of exchange.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Right on that point, I was reading this morning an article in which it was stated that on the 28th of April, 1909, the items "due to other national banks" from the banks of New York, Chicago, and St. Louis footed up in round numbers to $546,000,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; it has increased over $100,000,000 since we discussed the question last. Then it was about four hundred and a small fraction millions. It is evidently growing. It is evident that the outside banks are carrying larger reserves in the New York banks than then, and that the money of the country is concentrating in New York; and when it goes out of there it is at the will of the New York banks. I am not going into a general discussion of the financial system of balances, but it is written in this amendment to the extent that it requires the consideration I have given to it, in my judgment.

I should like to know what steps will be taken by the Government or by this board upon notice from a bank that they would not pay any interest. There is no time limit. So they might say that after to-morrow we will not pay any interest on the deposits held by us of this class of funds.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator yield for an answer at this time?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CARTER. The proposition of the Senator is that arrangements are being made to require that the money deposited in a neighborhood shall be retained in the neighborhood, and that, therefore, we are making arrangements to sluice it into the banks in New York. That is, as I understand, the Senator's first proposition. I will undertake in the course of a few moments, when the Senator yields the floor, to touch upon that aspect of this bill as covered by the amendment of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator gathers no wisdom as to my position between now and the time when he takes the floor in reply to it, he will be firing in the air. I have assumed no such position. I was considering not that the credits might stay in the neighborhood, but that the money might stay in the neighborhood. There is a vast difference between the question as to whether or not the credits on the books of a bank show that the money is in the bank and the question whether the money is in the bank or not.

Mr. CARTER. To give an illustration, we will assume that a given bank in the city of Boise, in the State of Idaho, declines to pay interest any further on postal savings funds and so notifies the authorities in charge. Thereupon, under the operation of this bill, the board may deposit that money in any other bank in Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. With the consent of the other bank.

Mr. CARTER. Of the other bank.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. The banks of Idaho may become so opulent that they will not require 2 per cent money——

Mr. HEYBURN. They would not take it to-day.

Mr. CARTER. But that day is somewhat distant, I anticipate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment here.

Mr. CARTER. Failing to get another bank in the State willing to take the discarded deposits—and that failure would not be encountered often—then the bonds referred to in the act may be invested in.

Mr. HEYBURN. May be what?

Mr. CARTER. May become the subject of investment. The money need not lie idle.

Mr. HEYBURN. The most violent assumption I have heard indulged in lately is the one just stated by the Senator. The banks in Idaho would not under existing conditions take a cent of this money. The Senator can just mark that down as a fact.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. They have all the money they can make use of and are complaining that there are not enough uses to absorb the money they have.

Mr. CARTER. That is a happy state of affairs.

Mr. HEYBURN. It exists in Idaho, and there are a great many other happy states of affairs in that State.

Mr. CARTER. I know—delightful fruit, fine men, and beautiful women. This happy situation is enviable, but I do not envy Idaho. I am glad of her prosperity. It is unique and really unparalleled in the history of any State in this Union.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is very gratifying, and these encomiums are delightful to the ears of those from Idaho.

It is easy enough to build up a theory based upon loaning this money to some other person, but it requires the cooperation of both parties. When the Government of the United States, accumulating as it might in Idaho a fund of a million dollars or so, goes to the banks there and says, "We want you to take this money into your vaults, and we want you to give security for it, which you do not give for ordinary deposits, and security we approve, and we want you to pay interest on it," it would meet with a dead silence on the part of those banks.

Mr. President, this security question is not very well developed——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment right here?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. It seems to me that the dangerous feature of this bill, if it has any danger at all in it, grows out of the fact that the Government in the first instance pays interest on these deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the first evil in it.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes; and next that because of the fact that it pays interest it must loan this money or invest it for the depositor. I want to ask the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Montana, if 5,000 national banks or state banks in the country, with deposits aggregating many hundreds of millions of dollars, do not pay any interest to secure deposits——

Mr. HEYBURN. Or give any bond.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan (continuing). Or give any bond, why should the Government engage in the banking business, pay interest, and then have the responsibility for these investments and practically go into partnership with the banks of the country?

Then one word further. I do not object to the saving individual receiving a return, but he can get that return in any commercial or industrial walk. He may get it in a building and loan association. He may get it from his state bank. But it is the overtimid man who wants his money back on the instant and who wants to take no chances at all who would use this system.

I do not remember whether it was the Senator from Utah or the Senator from Kansas, but I think, on reflection, it was the Senator from Kansas who told me the other day that he knew of one individual who bought $3,500 worth of post-office money orders and held them because he knew they were secure and he could get his money when he wanted it. If this Government desires to protect the timid and the helpless and hold their funds securely for them, let the Government hold those funds. That is a proper function. I would not object to it. There is nothing paternalistic in it. But when the Government undertakes to invest that fund for innumerable private citizens, I think there is great danger in it and that the Government, for some bad investment or bad policy which perhaps might result disastrously to millions of depositors, would be very seriously criticised and blamed and the foundations of our Government shaken because of this attempt to do business for private individuals.

Mr. HEYBURN. And, Mr. President——

Mr. BULKELEY and Mr. CARTER addressed the Chair.

Mr. HEYBURN. Just a moment. And, Mr. President, after a short time there would be an interminable squabble between the Government and the other creditors of failing institutions as to the right of preference, because no preference is given, and the Government of the United States in five years would have a thousand lawsuits on hand to determine whether or not they should be first considered or how the fund should be administered in the case of a bankrupt or failing estate. Oh, there is a nice prospect of confusion wrapped up in the folds of this bill!

I yield to the Senator from Connecticut temporarily.

Mr. BULKELEY. I wish to ask the Senator from Michigan if he does not understand that under the provisions of this bill, whatever may be the result of the investment of deposits, the Government is responsible to the individual depositor, not depending on the success of the investment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Certainly.

Mr. BULKELEY. So that, except to the Government of the United States, it makes no difference whatever.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes. But if the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me, my criticism lies in the fact that we originally undertake to pay interest.

Mr. BULKELEY. I think, if the Senator will permit me, that the iniquity of this whole bill, if there is any iniquity in it, is in the fact that you are establishing by law a demand on the banks of this country to pay interest on their deposits subject to withdrawal from day to day. I think that is the wrong principle of the law, if there is any—this attempt to establish a postal savings bank for the country and to demand that the funds shall be placed in the banks of the various localities, and that they shall pay interest, which is the most dangerous thing, I think, for a bank to engage in.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not object to the Government taking in this money at the post-offices and holding it for the people and repaying it through the post-offices, but in such a case the Government should segregate this money. It need not enter into our revenues. It need not become a part of our fiscal system. We simply hold it in trust for our citizens, and there will be millions of men who will deposit hundreds of millions of dollars to their credit under such circumstances.

Mr. CARTER. Would the Senator have all the collections made at the post-offices consigned to perpetual idleness and permanently withdrawn from the channels of trade?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I think that would be very dangerous, but I would not obligate the Government to loan it through the banks, thus exposing the Government to criticism and doubt.

Mr. CARTER. How could you dispose of this money if you did not loan it or invest it or otherwise handle it?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I would get the money back into activity through the medium of the individual citizen who makes his own investment in his own way, rather than to leave it to the initiative of the Government. I would make it of so little advantage to him to carry his money in idleness in the Government's hands that he would invest it in some enterprise in his own community.

Mr. CARTER. We now have, as I understand, a great many million dollars invested in post-office orders, payable to the purchasers and renewed annually at a cost of $3 per thousand. One engineer, I was informed recently, working on a dredge on the Panama Canal, had something in excess of $5,000 in money orders, which he had been regularly renewing each year, refusing to put the money in bank. The money was idle in the post-office or in the hands of the department. The Government could not touch it or use it. The individual not only lost the interest, but likewise suffered the penalty of an annual payment of $3 per thousand. If this money should be held by the Government without investment——

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. No; I did not say without investment.

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly; but we are endeavoring to devise means for its investment that will not disturb the financial equilibrium of the neighborhood and of the country. We require that it shall be deposited in the banks as near as may be at the point of reception; that it shall be deposited there with security, and that the board of trustees shall not be at liberty to take the money deposited in the State of Oregon and at will transfer it to the city of New York, nor to take the money deposited in South Carolina and send it for use in the State of Maine.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; but may the banks do it?

Mr. CUMMINS. The banks do it now.

Mr. CARTER. I suppose the banks in the West, as heretofore, when a surplus of money appears which can not be used at home, will send it where it will bring the best rate of interest.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why should not the Government do it? Why delegate the power to the banks to do it?

Mr. CARTER. I think with the Senator that this juggling of public funds throughout the country is an evil that ought to be guarded against. The Government is a water-logged institution in the banking world, helpless in the matter of self-protection, and used at certain times for the purpose of bracing banks in centers here and there, with questionable wisdom and sometimes with questionable propriety.

Mr. HEYBURN. I concur very largely in that sentiment, and therefore wonder at the attempt to put the Government into the banking business. If I were going to put the Government into the banking business, I would do it through the central banking system, and if I was going to have a central bank I would make it the capital business of the central bank system. If I were going to favor the postal savings bank, I would at the same time organize a central bank system of which these funds should be the capital. I would not have it in some one place. I would have a head to it, but I would have branches all over the country, so that these accumulated funds, which constituted the capital of the central banking system, should be distributed ratably and fairly throughout the country. But I am not ready now to develop further than the suggestion that plan, because we have to confront at no distant day the question of a central bank, and when we do confront it we have to consider the question where its capital is to come from. If the central-banking system is to be safe, its capital must be of that character that we may term "reasonably permanent" in its location and as free from fluctuation as possible.

I think it is safe to say that the volume of money in the postal savings bank, the aggregate of it, would probably be as little fluctuating as any fund one could imagine in the world, and therefore, perhaps, would make the best basis for the central banking system. We certainly can not establish a central bank, if it is a bank in the ordinary sense of the word at all, upon money realized from the sale of bonds. The Government only receives money through certain limited channels—through the revenues at its custom-houses or from the internal-revenue system and such like. We can not take that as the capital of a central banking system. We have to look somewhere for money that will rest nearly permanently in the bank as a basis not only of circulation, but of issue. Now, if you want to get the money into the channels of trade——

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRAWFORD in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. FLINT. My attention was called a moment ago by the Senator from Idaho to the purchase of bonds with these funds, and to the fact that it would have a tendency probably to advance the price.

Mr. HEYBURN. It generally does.

Mr. FLINT. I agree with the Senator. The Government having purchased the bonds at the advanced prices, if it should be required to sell them at a loss to repay depositors where would the money come from to make up this loss?

Mr. HEYBURN. There is a question I would not undertake to answer, because I never would reach it. But it is a reasonable question. I understand the Senator to inquire whence any loss would be compensated that the Government might suffer by reason of the depreciation of bonds it had purchased. Is that it?

Mr. FLINT. That is correct.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is no provision in this bill for it. The only provision is the ordinary commercial provision that it would come out of the pockets of the Government.

Mr. FLINT. There is another question I desire to ask the Senator, and that is whether or not, under the provisions of this bill permitting investments, the money could not be loaned on notes and mortgages? It says the money may be invested in the same bonds or securities in which the funds of savings banks are authorized to be invested by the laws of the State or Territory. I take it that most States and Territories permit the investment of the funds of such institutions in notes and mortgages.

Mr. HEYBURN. The State of California is made by one of the provisions of the bill one of the criteria.

Mr. FLINT. If the State has no such regulation, then the laws of California and New York apply, and in New York and California the banks are permitted to loan money on note and mortgage, and under this bill the trustees could make such loans in the several States of the United States, and there might be losses on those loans.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am under an obligation to the Senator from California for the valuable suggestions he has made as to the reckless, careless manner of this proposed legislation, that contains no provision for protection against those conditions; and you might multiply them many times over, conditions not imaginary, but such conditions as arise every day in the banking and business world and with which all men of affairs are familiar. If this law is to contain some safeguard against those conditions, let us have it brought forth; but if the only safeguard is the plaudits that we hear of the men who hold these positions to-day and the promise as to the men who will hold them to-morrow, it is a mighty poor kind of security against the loss to the Government. The depositors can lose nothing as long as the Government of the United States is solvent and Congress is willing to authorize the issuance of bonds to cover losses.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SHIVELY. Then under this bill at last the general taxpayer in furnishing the security.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and, Mr. President, as suggested by the Senator from California, it being allowed that the funds may be invested according to the rules of insurance or trust companies that invest in notes and mortgages, again would arise one of those cases that I have before referred to, of a contest between the Government and our creditors as to who should have the proceeds of the sale of this property.

Did anyone ever hear of the responsible proposition advanced that a government should loan the money gathered up through the postal savings banks as the ordinary money lender lends it, without any legal boundary or restriction or safeguard thrown around it? It is not even provided that it shall be a preferred claim against any fund. No governmental supervision is provided for over the corporations whose bonds the Government would buy, and the stability and value of the bonds could not be protected by the Government in any way. A railroad could be thrown into the hands of a receiver by a county court, and the Government would be holding its bonds as security for money that belonged to these depositors.

The banks in which the Government places the money under the terms of its deposits would be the poorest class of banks so far as security is concerned, because, as has been said by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH]—and his information is unquestionably accurate—the very large majority of the strong banks in the country would not participate in it, and those that did reach out for it would be the last ones that ought to have it.

Mr. President, we are about to vote upon an amendment here containing provisions that only add to the objections to the bill; that make it more difficult for the Government and easier for the banks to shift this money from one part of the country to the other.

I inquired when the Senator from Montana was speaking whether or not the prohibition which contained in the amendment against these three men, transferring the money from one part of the country to the other, applied to the banks; and, of course, he said no, because it does not. How could we, under any power that is vested in us, control the right of the banks, in whose hands we place this money, to send the money where they please? We do not even require them to carry a reserve in the home bank. They could send every dollar of it away. They can not do that with any other funds that they have. They must maintain a reserve under the law against ordinary deposits. They carry no reserve under this proposed amendment as against these deposits, and we tie our hands by placing the power, not in succeeding Congresses, but in succeeding appointive officers, who give no bond.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Idaho certainly did not intend to say that banks would be required to create no reserve against any of these deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they would not. The banks are not required to carry any reserve against deposits that are secured by bonds or sureties to-day.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I question it.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator is inaccurate, and I will call his attention to the law, if he desires to have it quoted. I am sure the Senator has confused the statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think we will arrive at a conclusion after we read the law, and not before it.

Mr. CARTER. Section 5153 provides for the designation of certain national banks as United States depositaries, and an act passed May 30, 1908, provides—that the provisions of section 5191 of the Revised Statutes, with reference to the reserves of national banking associations, shall not apply to deposits of public moneys by the United States in designated depositaries.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course, now, the Senator runs up against that and slides by it just as though he had not seen it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, let us be fair about this matter. I presume the Senator made an honest mistake in supposing the word "security" to be there, and that the statute would apply to all future acts of Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I did not make any mistake.

Mr. CARTER. A correct interpretation of the statute to which I have referred clearly applies exclusively to the one hundred and sixty odd million dollars deposited in national banks on the basis of collateral security deposited by these banks. The collateral security amounts to some one hundred and eighty odd million dollars.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know; but go to the provision, if the Senator pleases, with reference to the reserves.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is the exception to the general law.

Mr. CARTER. The exception is made of the reserve only as to moneys deposited under this peculiar section.

Mr. BULKELEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BULKELEY. Designated depositories are required just as well to put up a collateral for their deposits.

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly, a designated depository is required by law.

Mr. BULKELEY. The Senator referred to the $160,000,000, but it involves the daily deposit of postmasters and the revenue collected all through the country.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think the Senators understood, as well as they understand anything, that I was not referring, and I stated it plainly, to the class of balances carried to meet the current expenses. There is the other balance, where the Government places money, as it did three or four years ago, for all I know last year. That is an entirely different class of government deposits.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will, I think, admit, because it is the fact, that the Government of the United States does not deposit one dollar of either general funds or current receipts in any national bank without the deposit of callateral security.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course they do not; and does the Senator maintain that in that case, in a case where the Government had $250,000,000 in two banks in New York with collateral security, whatever its character may have been, that those banks carried a reserve against that deposit?

Mr. CARTER. No, sir; because——

Mr. HEYBURN. They did not.

Mr. CARTER. Because they are specifically——

Mr. HEYBURN. I am referring to that class of deposits.

Mr. CARTER. Because they are specifically exempt from the reserve provision by the section of the statute enacted in 1908.

Mr. HEYBURN. That makes no difference.

Mr. CARTER. Prior to that time the banks were required to keep a reserve to cover the amounts of special deposits made on collateral, just as on other current funds.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator has conceded just exactly what I said. I differentiated between the two classes of deposits in the beginning of my remarks clearly and fairly, and there could be no mistake as to my reference to deposits that were secured by collateral, made under the second classification that I stated, and in that case I reassert it, because in response to an inquiry from one of the Senators in charge of the finance bill, when the information was unquestionably accurate, it was stated that they carried no reserves at all, and the argument was made to show why they did not.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. Since my explanation quoting the statute so moved the Senator, I suspect possibly I did not understand his contention.

Mr. HEYBURN. That might be.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator's contention, as I understand it, was that no reserve would be required to be kept by the banks acting under the national banking act as against these postal savings-bank deposits. That statement is not according to the law. The only exemption is that made by the statute to which I have referred—deposits held in consequence of collateral security by depository banks designated under a special act of Congress.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senator is so sure of that, why not incorporate into this bill a provision to that effect, as to the reserves which shall be carried by the banks that hold the money? Why not incorporate it in the bill? Would it meet with the approval of the Senator from Montana if an amendment is offered providing that a reserve of a certain per cent shall be carried against these deposits?

Mr. BULKELEY and Mr. CARTER addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield, and to whom?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have yielded to the Senator from Montana; and if the Senator from Montana does not object, I will yield to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. BULKELEY. I wish to ask if this law does not simply apply to national banks, and there is no provision in the bill itself which requires state banks, which may be large depositories of this money, to have any reserve?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am obliged to the Senator for emphasizing the position which I took. Of course the Congress of the United States can make no provision requiring state banks to carry a reserve. We can focus this argument in a minute.

The Senator from Connecticut has very justly suggested that the state banks could carry no reserve against the deposits, and we have no power to compel them to do it. Therefore, would the Senator deposit these funds in a bank over which we have no control to prescribe the reserve which it should carry as a guaranty of its solvency?

Mr. BULKELEY. But, Mr. President, while you can not compel a state bank to maintain a reserve, you can by a provision of this bill provide that no deposit shall be made in a bank that is not required to maintain it, just the same as you require them to have state supervision. You can require them to maintain a reserve the same as national banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. We could prescribe such conditions here as would leave perhaps only one or two banks in the United States available as a depository for this money, but the change that has been brought about, the claim made for the bill, is that it extends the provisions to the state and other private banks. That is held up as being the item of merit in the new bill which is brought before us. Under the other bill it was provided that the money could be deposited only in national banks; and the cry went up, "You are going to shift so many hundreds of millions of dollars from the state banks and the insurance companies that do a banking business, and so on, to the national banks." That cry was sufficient to drown the demand for the yeas and nays on the bill in this body, and it went out, smothered to death by its own weight.

Now it comes back here with a provision that professes to extend the depositing capacity of the act to state and other banks, surety companies, and so on, and when the objection is made that they do not and can not be required to carry a reserve against the day of insolvency or embarrassment, it is suggested that they might be eliminated. If you eliminate them, you go back to where you were a year ago.

If you leave them in you are met by the unanswerable argument that the Government of the United States can in no way control or insure their sufficiency. Yet that is to be voted in in this amendment. I think it would be wise to allow the amendment to lie over.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I hope the Senator from Idaho does not refer to my amendment, because he has not given the pending amendment the respect of a passing glance in the whole argument that he has made this afternoon. He has been arguing another amendment. I hope he will not require my little, simple, plain, obvious amendment to go over on account of the objections which he has so forcibly expressed this afternoon. The whole matter, I know, will be open for amendment on the policy of the bill, but I should like to come to an end of this particular part of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the prohibition of the Senator from Iowa has come more nearly expressing what I may term the "measure of my toleration" of this bill than any other Senator who has discussed it. He is working in the right direction. His amendment provides that the withdrawals shall be made from the deposits in the State or Territory.

What I was saying was directed, at least in part, to the question how those deposits were to be kept in the State or Territory, and I was differentiating between the credit and the money, because if the United States Government or these three agents of the Government can not control that money, then this amendment would be without effect. If the money was sent away by the bank, the fact that it had not been authorized by the board or the act done by the board would be an ineffective proposition.

Mr. CUMMINS. There is no attempt here made to change the general banking law of the United States or of any State. We are dealing with the banks precisely as other depositors might deal with the banks. I hope that the Senator from Idaho will not think that this has any effect whatsoever upon the power which the banks have to deal with the money the Government deposits with them.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I realize that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am sure the Senator from Idaho will agree with me that it is wise. I do not ask him to agree that the bill is wise, because he has a very positive and somewhat persuasive view of the bill as a whole; but this simply means to say that if the depositors in New York want their money from the Government the Government can not go to the banks in Iowa and ask them for the money with which to pay off the depositors in New York. The whole course of the argument of the Senator from Idaho is in harmony with the policy that is attempted to be put in the bill by the amendment I have now offered.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I say to the Senator from Iowa let us talk together about this for a moment. It has a limitation in it as well as an enlarged right upon the people, because it might be held that if there was insolvency or failure in the fund within a State, because the fund would fall below the deposits, the depositor could not look to any other fund. Do you think that is sufficiently protected in that language?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not think that the contingency is proximate enough to even be considered, but I have no objection, as I suggested——

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. CUMMINS. As I suggested to the Senator from Nebraska, if it is desired to provide for that very remote possibility it can be put in anywhere, in a dozen different places in the bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator allow me to suggest right here, under that construction of the statute—that is to say, if the deposits in a State were impaired to the extent of a dollar, if the orders in that State, which must be exactly coextensive with the post-offices, were presented, there would be a shortage. That is evident. Now, could you draw against the fund of some other State for that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Possibly not; but it is very clear that before long, if the views of the Senator from Idaho are sound with regard to the condition in his own State—and I do not doubt his accuracy in that respect—the Government will have in the Treasury, or in some other form of security, all the deposits that are made at post-offices in Idaho; and there is no prohibition here against taking those deposits and using them for the purpose of paying depositors anywhere.

Mr. HEYBURN. There is an implied prohibition here.

Mr. CUMMINS. Only as to banks.

Mr. HEYBURN. It says the withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State or Territory in which they are made. It does not provide that they may be paid out of any general fund. Does the Senator think that is sufficiently comprehensive to the public?

Mr. CUMMINS. I have no right to consume the Senator's time in these interruptions.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not object.

Mr. CUMMINS. All I ask is that if there is some contingency that is not provided for by the amendment I have proposed, then I hope the Senator will amend my amendment or suggest an amendment that will cover the danger he has in view, and not put my amendment under the weight of his wrath against the bill generally. I should like to see it perfected in this respect and then take up the question of policy which he has so ably argued this afternoon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest, offhand, an amendment that will perhaps meet the Senator's approval. It is to make it read:

Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State or Territory so far as the fund on deposit in such State or Territory may be sufficient.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will accept the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. And in the event that it shall not be sufficient, that they may be paid out of the accumulated fund in the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am perfectly willing to accept the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I merely suggest that amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognized, when the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] first mentioned it, that there might possibly be a time when the money deposited in the banks of any State or Territory would not be sufficient to meet the withdrawals of that State. I fancy that it would not occur in a million years, if we endure that long. But, nevertheless, I am willing to provide for the last and remote contingency.

Mr. HEYBURN. Now, here is the second clause:

And so far as practicable from the deposits in the community in which the depositor withdrawing resides.

Suppose a man makes a deposit in Iowa, and makes it to the limit, $5,000, and he afterwards resides in Idaho. From which fund would he withdraw?

Mr. CUMMINS. In that particular case, the general rule or policy I am seeking to maintain would be departed from, and the deposits made in the State of Idaho would be used to pay the depositor, although at the time the deposit was made he may have lived in Iowa and made his deposit in Iowa, but it would not affect in anywise the right of the depositor to get his money, and that is the thing, I fancy, that the Senator from Idaho is particularly solicitous to govern and secure.

Mr. HEYBURN. It would affect the right of depositors in Idaho to the extent that the Iowa man came and depreciated the fund in Idaho. How would that fund be recouped?

Mr. CUMMINS. By citizens of Idaho moving into Iowa; and I hope they will move there in large numbers.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, Mr. President, that only points the wisdom of this legislation. I do not mean the wisdom of the suggestion of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], because his ability is such that we must recognize it, especially in legal matters, and his amendment was skilfully drawn, but this question is bigger than all of the amendments that you will ever get adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I realize that. I am not attempting in anywise to minimize the scope of the great question of policy involved in this bill as a whole, but I do not think that these considerations relate to that particular amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. I took this amendment in my hand for the purpose of concentrating my remarks upon it, having been charged with having forgotten.

Mr. President, it will be seen that every principle touching the manner of the deposit or the withdrawal of these funds that I have discussed this afternoon is wrapped up in this amendment in some form; but if we are going to turn it all over to a board, not selected by Congress, but to be selected by whoever may hereafter occupy the office of President, we do not need to legislate on the subject at all. As I suggested, I think, yesterday, we might change the title of the bill and denominate it "A bill to provide for the collection of the money of the poor people to be used by a board of trustees to be appointed by the President under such terms and conditions as they may hereafter adopt."

I do not care to now occupy more time on the amendment, but there are a great many questions yet reserved in this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAGE. Just a moment, Mr. President. I should like to say a few words.

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] seems to think we are delegating too much power to this board of trustees. On the other hand, I believe that the tendency of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] is to inject into the bill a regulation of so many of the small details as to make the bill impracticable. To illustrate: Instead of leaving the question of securities for the board of trustees, we provide that when a bank secures a deposit of the postal funds it shall give security satisfactory to the board of trustees, and after the money has been placed in the hands of the bank it shall not thereafter be withdrawn except under very peculiar conditions.

It seems to me that in the very nature of things the security which may be deposited to-day as security for funds, in five years may have depreciated so that the security will be insufficient. We must leave some discretion to this board of trustees.

Again, the bill provides that any bank which is subject to national or state supervision may take these deposits. I do not know, however, of any way in which the board of trustees can compel the state supervisors or the state bank examiners to disclose what they find about a bank.

The provisions do not seem to dovetail as they ought to do if you undertake to tie the matter up in this way. So I say we ought to leave a discretion in the hands of the board of trustees, so that they may at all times preserve the high character of the securities, that they may at all times either get such satisfactory information from the state examiner as they must have, or else not be compelled to make the deposit, or, having made it, shall not be compelled to leave it in the bank if they think it unsafe.

Furthermore, in looking over the details of this bill, which its framers have tried to tie up with so much nicety, I can not see that any provision is made for fresh deposits in a bank which may at the time it received the original deposit have given satisfactory security. The law says that the funds thereafter deposited shall be made in this or that bank. There is no provision here that the bank shall in advance deposit security for that fund. The result may be that the current deposit will be without security.

Mr. CARTER. Before the Senator proceeds in that behalf with the provision which empowers the board of trustees to make the regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and so forth, of these funds, it seems to me that it would be an eminently appropriate regulation for the board to stipulate that no bank should receive a deposit until the security had been provided and approved; and I doubt not, under the general authority to make regulations, they would so provide.

Mr. PAGE. I have no doubt that in the absence of specific directions to the contrary that would be correct, but may I ask the Senator from Montana if he believes that under the provisions of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa the board of trustees would have a right to withdraw the funds from a bank which, from any cause, they came to believe was becoming insolvent, or from a bank the securities of which, from any cause, they thought were becoming weaker and less satisfactory?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Or for any other cause.

Mr. PAGE. Or for any other cause.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is probable that the right of the board in that direction might be made more specific by an amendment which would require the banks to maintain indemnity bonds or collateral security to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, and whenever the board reached the conclusion that the security or the collateral was inadequate or unsatisfactory, the funds could undoubtedly be withdrawn if such amendment were provided.

Mr. PAGE. I have no doubt that this bill can be amended in that particular so as to make it satisfactory; but if, in a casual reading of this bill, I can find two or three fatal objections, is it not probably true that we are here in this Hall trying to frame a bill which, when put to the test, will be found to be impracticable; a bill which can not be utilized for the purpose for which it is drawn, and should we not set forth here the purpose of this act, to wit, to keep these funds in the State from which they came, and leave the matter with the trustees to carry out the spirit of this law in some way without attempting to hamper them with rules? It seems to me that we can; and that, it seems to me, would be the better way.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. KEAN. Let the amendment be stated.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to have the amendment again read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again stated.

The SECRETARY. As modified, the amendment is to insert in line 7, section 7, after the word "prescribe," the following:

Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State or Territory, so far as the postal funds on deposit in said State or Territory may be sufficient for the purpose, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor withdrawing resides.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I want to ask the Senator having in charge this bill a question. The bill now provides that not less than 2½ per cent shall be paid per annum, and by an amendment to-day we have provided that this shall not be a matter of profit to the Government. Now, Mr. President, I ask the Senator if he has any objection in section 6, line 1, before the words "two per centum," to inserting "not less than," so that the depositors in certain contingencies might be granted a little higher rate of interest than 2 per cent? Suppose that a large fund had accumulated. We are not going to make any profit out of it, according to our own declaration. Might not the board of trustees be permitted for a time, we will say, to allow a little higher rate of interest to the poor people who have been furnishing the money? If the Senator objects to such an amendment, of course I will not offer it.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator is well aware that it is not the desire to put this postal savings institution into competition with the savings banks or other institutions paying interest on small deposits. I imagine that in a very short time there might be an almost irresistible demand made upon the trustees for an increase of the rate if they were empowered to make such increase. It seems to me wiser policy for the time being, pending the thorough installation of the system, to have stability in that particular as far as practicable.

Mr. GALLINGER. I think there is force in that; and yet I will say to the Senator that I am somewhat troubled as to what we are going to do with this money if we get a large accumulation of it. We have announced that we are not going to run this institution as a matter of profit to the Government. If we get a very large accumulation of money, what are we going to do with it?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, according to the provisions of the bill as it was originally reported—and there is nothing in the amendment contrary thereto—the funds will be deposited in the banks in the neighborhood where received on the approval of securities by indemnity bond or collateral. Through the operation of this we have an investment made automatically by the mere deposit under contractual arrangement for interest, and at the same time the money is left in the community to enrich the channels of trade.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, of course in a matter of that kind I defer to the better judgment of the Senator from Montana, and will not offer the amendment which I had in mind; and yet it does seem to me that if these poor men are contributing money sufficiently to warrant a little higher rate than 2 per cent they ought to have the benefit of it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there be no further amendments proposed, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have been notified by a number of Senators that they desired to speak upon this measure before it came to a vote. I do not care to stand here in the position of one holding the bill against their coming. So I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho withhold the motion?

Mr. HEYBURN. I withhold the motion for a moment.

Mr. CARTER. Before that motion is put, and for the purpose of advising Senators who desire to address the Senate on this measure of the time when a vote will be taken, I ask unanimous consent that the final vote be taken on the bill on Thursday of next week at the hour of 4 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object. I would discuss it if it were debatable, but it is not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, then I hope the Senator will yield for a motion to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the Senate desires to proceed to the consideration of executive business, I will withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BULKELEY. I hope before that motion is put the Senator will allow me to ask for the consideration of a short bill. I have to leave town to-morrow for a somewhat extended absence, and there is a bill, authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River, in the State of Connecticut, that I should like to have passed.

Mr. CARTER. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

CONNECTICUT RIVER BRIDGE, CONNECTICUT.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5680) authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Connecticut River, in the State of Connecticut, between the towns of Old Saybrook and Old Lyme.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in line 7, after the word "River," to insert "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the State of Connecticut, acting through the Saybrook and Lyme Connecticut River Bridge Commission, a commission created by the laws of the State of Connecticut, be, and hereby is, authorized to construct and maintain a drawbridge across the Connecticut River, at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, between the towns of Old Saybrook and Old Lyme, in the State of Connecticut, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LIGHT STATION AT BATTERY POINT, WASHINGTON.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

Mr. PILES. I ask the Senator from Montana to withhold his motion, in order that I may report a bill from the Committee on Commerce and ask for its present consideration.

Mr. CARTER. I withhold the motion for that purpose.

Mr. PILES. I am directed by the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4458) to increase the limit of cost of the light and fog-signal station to be established at Battery Point, Washington, to report it with amendments, and I submit a report (No. 181) thereon. I ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments of the Committee on Commerce were, in line 8, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "thirty-three;" and in line 9, before the word "thousand," to strike out "thirty-four" and insert "forty-seven," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the limit of cost of a light and fog-signal station to be established at Battery Point, Wash., heretofore authorized by the acts approved June 28, 1902, February 26, 1907, and March 4, 1907, is hereby increased by the sum of $33,000, so as to make the total limit of cost $47,000 instead of $14,000, as heretofore authorized.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 3, 1910.

The house met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by the Rev. John Van Schaick, jr.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PERSONAL PRIVILEGE.

Mr. CROW. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CROW. Mr. Speaker, while I was absent yesterday at lunch a letter which I wrote was read. I am wholly responsible for every word that is in that letter and expressed my views exactly, and I do not regret having written it. The only thing I do regret is that there are some Members of this House so narrow-minded as to get the idea that the President of the United States or any of his subordinates had anything whatever to do with the writing of that letter. But it seems that our Democratic friends are ever ready to raise a howl or a roar when a piece of pie is cut and they do not share in it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is not speaking to a question of personal privilege. If the gentleman desires to make a political speech I have no doubt that this side will grant unanimous consent that he may do so. I do not think, however, that the gentleman has stated a question of personal privilege.

Mr. CROW. Mr. Speaker, then I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROW. Mr. Speaker, a shining example of the fairness and nonpartisanism of the Democrats of this country can be seen in the shape of my district, which is almost 400 miles long and at one place only about 27 miles wide. It was gerrymandered by the Democratic party for the sole purpose of making it Democratic forever, but, thank goodness, there have been enough Republicans who have removed from the North to make it Republican, and it will remain Republican so long as it stays in the shape that it is now in. Another shining example of Democratic fairness can be seen in the vote cast in one county in my State, which is strongly Democratic. One township of that county had, it was estimated, 2,000 persons living in it, and yet a vote was cast of more than 1,500. The Democratic chairman was asked how he accounted for that. He said:

> Why, we always vote the name of every man, living or dead, who has ever lived in this township within the last forty years, and to make it good measure we vote his horses' and his dogs' names sometimes.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 18162—the agricultural appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, with Mr. CAMPBELL in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The business pending before the committee when it rose on Tuesday last was an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment, as follows:

> "Paper test: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to test such plants and woods as may require tests to ascertain if they be suitable for making paper, $14,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman begins I would inquire to what section this is offered as an amendment?

Mr. MANN. This is a new paragraph, to be inserted at the end of line 20 on page 38. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is intended, if adopted, to take the place of the item on page 62 of the bill in relation to paper tests. The purpose of inserting the paragraph at this place is in order to put the appropriation under the control of the Forestry Bureau, where it is now actually controlled. When the item on page 62 was first inserted in the bill, several years ago, the money carried was divided between the Bureau of Plant Industry and the Forestry Service, but since that time a new item has been inserted in the bill, carried in the pending bill, for the work done by the Bureau of Plant Industry, under the head of the "Plant Industry Bureau," and this item, I think, should properly be carried under the Bureau of Forestry. When the appropriation was made, it was first intended by the department to divide the $10,000 between the Bureau of Plant Industry and the Forest Service. I have become interested in the matter through my service on the special committee, and I took the matter up with the Department of Agriculture, and it was determined that this appropriation should be expended by the Forest Service.

The amendment also carries an increase in the amount from $10,000 to $14,000. There have been two plans proposed in reference to this work of investigation of the question of making ground-wood pulp out of other woods than spruce. Those plans are set forth in the RECORD on page 1361. Both plans contemplate the cooperation of the American Pulp and Paper Association, that association furnishing a portion of the money. One of the plans contemplates that the Government shall furnish $14,000 and the American Pulp and Paper Association shall furnish $21,200, and that is the plan upon which the item of $14,000 is based, if it shall be adopted. The other plan proposed would cost the Government $6,000 and the American Pulp and Paper Association $4,770. One plan contemplates an endeavor to test the making of ground wood other than spruce in a commercial way, and the other contemplates work in the laboratory only. We are in this situation, that to-day we make wood pulp, the basis of all cheap papers, practically only out of spruce wood. We have a very limited quantity of spruce wood in the United States, and we are, or we shortly will be, depending upon Canada for our spruce-wood supply. We want to see if it is not possible to make ground-wood pulp in a commercial way so that it can be used as a basis for cheap print paper, as spruce now is, out of other kinds of wood, and the present contemplation is to try balsam, hemlock, and jack pine. There are immense quantities of jack pine scattered over the United States, most of it valueless because as a rule it is not large enough to make good saw logs. If we can discover a practical commercial method of making ground wood out of the jack pine that grows so readily we will not be dependent on Canada for our future cheap-paper supply, and even if it shall demonstrate to us by our experiments that it is not possible to make this ground-wood pulp out of other kinds than spruce, it will be worth to us many times what it will cost, because we will then know that we must either raise the spruce through governmental agencies or else depend upon the Canadian supply of spruce, and for that reason, while it is not yet definitely settled that the $14,000 will be required instead of $6,000, I hope the House will consent to authorize the expenditure of the $14,000 on the part of the Government, which will be accompanied by $21,200 from the pulp and paper association, if they shall conclude that that is the best method of making the investigation.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understood the gentleman to say that the association of manufacturers contribute an amount of money equal to a third more than is proposed to be appropriated for the same purpose.

Mr. MANN. The manufacturers have offered to furnish the equipment, which, if that plan were adopted, will cost $18,000; the cost of the installation of the experiment, which will be $2,000; and the cost of the wood for a year's supply, which is estimated at $1,200, so that the amount to be contributed by the manufacturers will be $21,200, as against $14,000 proposed to be expended by the Government.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Does that proposition give the manufacturers any sort of supervision or control over the experiments?

Mr. MANN. Not at all.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Nor any control over the discovery?

Mr. MANN. Not in the slightest degree.

Mr. TAWNEY. The $14,000 would not be the total contribution of the Government?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. TAWNEY. Would not the salaries of the men engaged in making the investigations be paid out of the appropriations made for the payment of their salaries in addition to the other?

Mr. MANN. No; it is paid out of this sum; this covers the question of salaries.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I shall not oppose this amendment. It does not materially change the bill, and I am inclined to think that the change it does make is proper, in view of the facts that have been presented by the gentleman from Illinois. When it was first determined, three years ago, to enter upon this investigation, it was not known exactly in which bureau the work would properly come, and the paragraph providing for it was accordingly inserted as an independent paragraph, so that the Secretary might designate men in any bureau of the department to engage in the study of the problem. As the work has progressed, it seems to have divided naturally into two branches, one of them conducted by the Bureau of Plant Industry for testing and breeding fibrous plants which may be used for paper making, and the other one, the one now under consideration, passing to the Forest Service, which has been making a study as to the value of various kinds of trees for pulp-making purposes. Inasmuch as the work done under the authority of the paragraph in question is now confined to the Forest Service, I see no reason why the provision authorizing the appropriation to pay for it should not come under the Forest Service. In reference to the increase of the amount, I believe the House will concur in the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois that if by the expenditure of $4,000 more than was contemplated we can have a test made upon a commercial scale of new methods or of the availability of new materials, the money will be well expended. For these reasons, therefore, I trust that the amendment will prevail.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, just a word, which I think is due to Doctor Galloway. When this item was put in the bill last year the department divided this $10,000 between the Bureau of Plant Industry and the Forest Service, and the other $10,000 went to the Bureau of Plant Industry. I called on Doctor Galloway in reference to the matter, and explained the situation to him—a more courteous and efficient public officer, I think everyone who meets Doctor Galloway will say, has never drawn a salary or filled an office without a salary—as it was wholly with his acquiescence that the change which was made was brought about.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to strike out of the bill lines 7 to 12, on page 62.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to strike from the bill certain lines, which the Clerk will report.

Page 62, lines 7 to 12, both inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided, That no part of the money herein appropriated shall be used to pay the transportation or traveling expenses of any forest officer or agent except he be traveling on business directly connected with the Forest Service and in furtherance of the works, aims, and objects specified and authorized in and by this appropriation: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article; but this shall not prevent the giving out to all persons, without discrimination, including newspaper and magazine writers and publishers, of any facts or official information of value to the public.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, in order to accomplish what was intended by this proviso, I move to amend by inserting after the word "persons," in line 6, the words "when requested."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Minnesota offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 39, line 6, after the word "persons," insert "when requested," so that it will read, "giving out to all persons, when requested, without discrimination," etc.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the first part of this paragraph or proviso is to prohibit the expenditure of any part of the appropriations made for the purpose of paying for the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article. Then the language follows which says:

But this shall not prevent the giving out to all persons, without discrimination, including newspaper and magazine writers and publishers, of any facts or official information of value to the public.

Now, it has come to my notice, and there has been forwarded to me a number of articles prepared in the Forestry Bureau for publication in newspapers and magazines, notwithstanding the prohibition in this proviso. This will continue as long as they are allowed to give newspaper and magazine writers and publishers any facts or official information of value to the public, for it does not say in what form the information shall or may be furnished. This is why the fore part of the proviso is violated. While they are prohibited from preparing articles for magazines and newspapers, they are in fact preparing articles for magazines and newspapers under the provision which says that they are authorized to give out without discrimination certain facts or official information. Now, if the language is inserted which I propose here, whereby they would be limited to the giving out of facts or official information only upon request, then we would stop what the committee and what Congress has heretofore attempted to stop, namely, the wholesale preparation of newspaper and magazine articles.

I think that would materially reduce the amount which has heretofore been expended for the preparation of newspaper and magazine articles that have been prepared by the bureau under the language of the existing law. This only carries out the spirit and intent of the law; that is, they were to give out official information and facts when requested to do so. If any writer or any newspaper desires information concerning the work of the bureau, and requests that information, then the department would be authorized to furnish it, but it would not be authorized to prepare, voluntarily, for the magazines and newspapers general articles on the subject of the work of the bureau. I think the amendment ought to be adopted.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I think the proposed amendment of the distinguished gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY] would defeat the very purpose of this proviso of the bill. The object here is clearly stated and fairly and reasonably inferred, namely, to have the department give out information and facts which it thinks is of value to the public. Now, then, if you limit it to the giving out of these facts and furnishing this information only to those who may request it, it will be, in effect, an inhibition against any general publication of important information or facts that are required and the public may never get unless somebody hunts around and finds them out and publishes them in the interest of the publication which he represents.

Mr. TAWNEY. The gentleman from Ohio is aware that this proviso is put in here for the purpose of putting a stop to or breaking up the practice of having men in the bureaus devote their time to the preparation of newspaper and magazine articles.

Mr. KEIFER. That is already taken care of separately in the first part of the proviso.

Mr. TAWNEY. But that practice continues to-day just as it did before the existing language of the law.

Mr. KEIFER. It will not be carried at all by the amendment proposed.

Mr. TAWNEY. It will be, if it becomes a law and the law is observed.

Mr. KEIFER. If observed, it would not. Let us read this proviso carefully:

Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be paid or used for the purpose of paying for, in whole or in part, the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article.

Now, that is complete within itself; that part of the proviso is well understood, and it works a prohibition against paying out or using any part of the appropriation for the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article, whereas under the gentleman's amendment that very thing would be done.

Then follows:

But this shall not prevent the giving out to all persons, without discrimination, including newspaper and magazine writers and publishers, of any facts or official information of value to the public.

The gentleman from Minnesota proposes to put in after the word "persons" the words "upon request." That is to say, in effect, under any fair construction, if this language is in it, that the information can not be gained and the facts shall not be published under any circumstances for the benefit of anybody unless somebody makes a request for it. That will be the effect of the language, and it has nothing to do with the first part of the proviso, which is intended to be accomplished by prohibiting the use and preventing the use of or the preparation of matter for any magazine or newspaper articles.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. KEIFER. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. Do you mean to say that this would in any way interfere with the department or the Bureau of Forestry publishing, as it does now publish, full information with regard to the work of the bureau in the bulletins published by the bureau?

Mr. KEIFER. I do not mean to say that; but I do mean to say that it would prohibit the giving out of information that might be of great interest to the public and prevent that information being given out, and the facts published at the time that it ought to be given to the public, unless somebody requested it to be given out. The printing of the reports of the different bureaus, the printing of the bulletins that go to the archives of the different departments and are picked up and sent out as it happens or as people call for them, is another thing. But there may be very important information, very important facts, that the public should have, and that they should be permitted to give, which the amendment proposed would prohibit being given out at all.

Mr. MORSE. Mr. Chairman, I am very much opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. TAWNEY], because I believe that it would prevent the people getting a good deal of valuable information that they are entitled to receive. It so happens that there is given out from the department information that can be condensed in small space that is not of sufficient size or dignity to be published in a bulletin. Now, then, this is given out gratis to many newspapers throughout the United States.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, it is given out in the shape of articles prepared in violation of this law.

Mr. MORSE. If the gentleman from Minnesota had had a great deal of newspaper experience, he would be cognizant of the fact that if this information is prepared in the department and given out in its prepared form it would be of greater benefit to the public than if prepared in a thousand little newspaper offices throughout the country.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman will permit me, that would be in violation of this law.

Mr. KEIFER. Not if your amendment is in.

Mr. TAWNEY. That is what the amendment is intended to prevent.

Mr. KEIFER. The effect would be just what you say it ought not to be.

Mr. MORSE. There are thousands of little newspapers published throughout this country glad to publish this material free, but they will not request it. If the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota prevails, a great deal of valuable information will be prevented from getting to the people. They are entitled to it. The newspapers are willing to grant the space free; and I believe we should permit the department to send this out without being specifically requested in each particular instance. I believe that the Forestry Bureau of the Agricultural Department is one of the most valuable activities of the Government. We are paying these scientific people for the work they are doing, and the wider publicity we can give to the work being done in this bureau the greater will be the benefit received from that work. Now, the intention of the amendment of the gentleman from Minnesota is to restrict the giving out of this information, which he himself does not say is of no value.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in ten minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Will the gentleman from Minnesota permit me to ask him one question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in ten minutes.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Is not the gentleman's proposition self-contradictory? The gentleman from Minnesota proposes that the information shall not be given out except upon request. Now, how is anybody to know that they have the information? You have got, in the first place, to tell somebody that you have got it before they will ask for it. They are not going to ask for something that they do not know anything about. Therefore, if they have discovered a new thing and are not allowed to tell anybody about it, nobody will ask for it. The proposition contradicts itself.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 18282. An act making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1910, and for other purposes; and

H. R. 15384. An act making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3983. An act to amend the act of April 23, 1904 (33 Stat. L., p. 302), entitled "An act for the survey and allotment of lands embraced within the limits of the Flathead Indian Reservation, in the State of Montana, and the sale and disposal of all surplus lands after allotment," and all amendments thereto; and

S. 614. An act to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Dewitt Eastman," approved January 8, 1909.

The message also announced that the Vice-President had appointed Mr. PURCELL a member of the joint committee on the part of the Senate, as provided for in the joint resolution of January 19, 1910, entitled "Joint resolution authorizing an investigation of the Department of the Interior and its several bureaus, officers and employees, and of the Bureau of Forestry, in the Department of Agriculture, and its officers and employees," in place of Mr. PAYNTER, resigned from said committee.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. TAWNEY. Mr. Chairman, the Department of Agriculture, including the Bureau of Forestry, is expending large sums of money annually in reports and bulletins which fully explain the activities of the department and the bureaus and all new discoveries that are made from time to time in these bureaus and in the department. The law especially provides for that, in order that the people may be fully informed as to what the department is doing. Now, up until about two years ago the practice of preparing articles in the Bureau of Forestry for publication in magazines and newspapers, articles that were intended primarily for the purpose of boosting the bureau rather than giving information to the public, had been abused to such an extent that Congress, in order to put a stop to it, expressly provided that no part of the appropriation for the Bureau of Forestry should be used for the purpose of paying, in whole or in part, for the preparation or publication of any newspaper or magazine article.

Now, the intention of Congress was to put a stop to the preparation of magazine and newspaper articles. It is not the function of any department to maintain a press association for the purpose of exploiting itself, and to put a stop to it Congress put in this prohibition. But under the language which follows that which I have just read the practice is continued. I have during the last year received a number of completed articles prepared in the Bureau of Forestry for publication in newspapers, and sent broadcast, to be released on a certain day. Now, the intent of Congress was that the giving out of facts and official information should be limited to those persons who desired the information. Instead of that the bureau has gone on and continued its press agency in the bureau, at an expense, I understand, of something like $70,000 during the last fiscal year. Now, I want to call attention to the fact that this press-agent service is comparatively new in the departments here at the seat of government. It is not only in the Agricultural Department; it is extending to all the departments; and as the result of it, and as the result of the influence which these departments are able to wield through the press of this country, it is almost impossible for a man to stand upon this floor and criticise a bureau, or the department, without himself being subjected to severe criticism, no matter how just his complaint may be against the bureau. These press agents and these publicity bureaus in the several departments of the Government are maintained largely for the purpose of exploiting and popularizing the bureau, to the end that its activities may be increased, and also its appropriations from year to year. One reason why many of the appropriations for a number of bureaus in the various departments of the Government can not be kept down is because of the influence which these bureaus exert to-day in the press of the country in the districts of the several Members of this House.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not think that the department ought to withhold any information from the public, outside of the information that is published in the reports and in the bulletins; but I do say that the giving out of any additional information or facts should be limited to those who request it, because those are the people who undoubtedly would want to use it, and in the use of it they might perhaps satisfy their readers; but the idea of maintaining generally, in view of the prohibition here, a press agency in the Bureau of Forestry was not, I say, the intent of Congress when this prohibition was enacted.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman's proposition were enacted into law might there not be danger that those newspapers which have correspondents in Washington, and magazines which do not, would request this information not given to the public generally, and other papers would not be able to get it, so that the very purpose of the gentleman would fail, in that all of the information would be furnished to the newspaper correspondents and the magazines who can get it by request, and the little newspapers that reach the people in the country would not be able to get the information?

Mr. TAWNEY. The small newspapers that the gentleman refers to will get their information as well from the metropolitan press represented in the city of Washington—and that is where they do get the most of their information now—and it serves the same purpose as if they got it directly from the department. The gentleman does not pretend to say that the Bureau of Forestry is furnishing newspaper articles for all country newspapers; the articles prepared in the bureau to-day in violation of law are furnished to the metropolitan press.

Mr. MANN. I mean to say that all of the memoranda and all that the bulletins cover are furnished to everybody, but under the gentleman's proposition they could get only what was furnished to the magazines.

Mr. TAWNEY. No man can go into any department to-day and obtain any information except that which is prepared by the press agent in the interests of the bureau and the department.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how the gentleman's amendment would change it.

Mr. TAWNEY. It would limit it in this bureau to the furnishing of information upon request.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, we spend several hundred thousand dollars a year through the Forest Service to acquire information that we think will be useful to the people of the United States. It would certainly be gross extravagance to spend large sums to acquire this information and then refuse to disseminate it. I do not entertain the feeling of nervousness and agitation in relation to the alleged press bureau of the Forest Service which has prompted the gentleman from Minnesota to offer this amendment. More than two years ago it was charged that such a bureau was maintained and was used for the purpose of exploiting and popularizing the service. It was alleged that large sums of money were expended annually to defray the expense of preparing newspaper and magazine articles, the primary purpose of which was to exploit the bureau rather than to convey information to the people. In order to correct this alleged evil a proviso was inserted in the bill providing that no part of the appropriation should be expended for such purpose.

The bureau did not oppose it, the Agricultural Committee did not oppose it, because the bureau had always declared that no such articles were prepared, and there was therefore no objection to the inhibition against it. The work which is done by the alleged bureau is simply to send out broadcast over the country items of information that would be useful to the people in the conservation of their forests, in the more economical use of timber, in the best methods of lumbering, and things of that sort. And these news items are not furnished alone to the big magazines, but the bureau maintains a mailing list of 750,000 names, and in that list are included practically all of the newspapers in the country, small as well as great. Through the use of the newspapers there was obtained for these paragraphs last year a circulation of over 9,000,000 copies, at no cost to the Government except for the preparation of the articles. If these articles had not contained useful information they certainly would not have been so widely printed.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. TAWNEY. What is the difference between information furnished the newspapers and magazines and that furnished in the bulletins of the bureau?

Mr. SCOTT. A bulletin is a longer and more carefully worked out article; it is a complete study of some particular question.

Mr. TAWNEY. The information is the same. They may be written in a little better style, perhaps, but the information is the same, and if you continue this service, what is the use of the bulletin?

Mr. SCOTT. A bulletin is a longer and more complete study of some particular subject. It may contain 30 or 40 pages, while these articles would rarely take more than half a column in a newspaper. They contain brief suggestions, bits of information covering a very wide range of subjects, extremely useful and yet not of a character which would justify publication in bulletin form, and by being sent out to the newspapers they are given immeasurably wider circulation than would be possible in any other way.

I think it would be against public interest and would impair the usefulness of the department to have the amendment which the gentleman from Minnesota offers inserted in the bill, and I trust that the House will vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Minnesota.

The question was taken, and the amendment was lost.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, during the past several weeks the local press has devoted considerable space to informing us as to the attitude of gentlemen on the other side of the aisle with reference to the so-called "Taft policies." We have been informed that gentlemen on that side have been exceedingly diligent and active in declaring themselves unalterably, unwaveringly, and eternally committed to all of the so-called "Taft policies." One of these policies, as I learn from his messages sent to the House by the President, is the purpose of the administration to increase the postal rates on newspapers and periodicals, thus further taxing the intelligence of the country. Not long ago the public press informed us that the President in a public speech declared that the Payne-Aldrich tariff measure was the best tariff bill ever passed by Congress. This sentiment has been repeated and indorsed innumerable times by gentlemen on the other side of the aisle. Even the Speaker himself is credited in the public press with having quoted with approval this sentiment of the President. In this connection, Mr. Chairman, I send to the Clerk's desk a short telegram, clipped from the St. Louis Republic, which I desire to have read in my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

EVEN HOLINESS GETS COSTLY—PRICE OF BIBLES WILL GO UP ON MARCH 1 BECAUSE OF TARIFF.

CHICAGO, ILL., January 30, 1910.

The price of Bibles will go up on March 1, according to an announcement to-day by a large Bible publishing house, which has branches in Cincinnati, Kansas City, and San Francisco. The cause for the advance is the enforcement of the new tariff on imported leather and paper.

"Bibles are now about 20 per cent higher than they have ever been before," said a member of the firm. "The materials for the best Bibles have gone up so high in price on account of the tariff that we can not afford to continue to sell our output at prices now listed."

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. So, Mr. Chairman, not content with its diabolical success, through oppressive rates, in taxing the Holy Bible out of the homes of the poor people, they are now bent on another policy almost as diabolical in its purpose and as injurious in its effects, and that is, to take away from the poor man the weekly newspaper. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the Republican party, in its last dying efforts to perpetuate itself, has been forced to base its hope of success upon decreasing intelligence in the country and upon that chaotic condition of public morals which will exist when the weekly newspaper, that great source of information and wisdom, and the Bible of our mothers have been withdrawn from the people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may address the committee for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, it has been the uniform custom of this committee not to inject politics into the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill; but in view of the attitude taken by a member of the committee on the other side of the aisle, I wish to read a newspaper clipping for the benefit of the distinguished gentleman who has just taken his seat. It is as follows:

IMPORTS FREE OF DUTY VALUED AT $699,799,771 IN 1909—MORE THAN HALF THE IMPORTS.

WASHINGTON, January 30, 1910.

More than half of the merchandise imported under the new tariff law enters the United States free of duty. The new act went into effect August 6, 1909, but the Bureau of Statistics of the Department of Commerce and Labor shows only full months in statements of imports and exports. Taking the full month of August, the share of the imports entering free of duty was 46.32 per cent; in September, 49.25 per cent; in October, 50.61 per cent; in November, 54.11 per cent; and in December, 55.96 per cent, the average for the entire five-month period being 51.5 per cent. This is a larger percentage of imports free of duty than under any prior law of this character except the act of 1890, which, admitting sugar free of duty, showed an unusually high proportion of nondutiable imports. Prior to that time the highest annual average importation free of duty occurred in 1841, when 49.73 per cent of the imports were free of duty, the figures for 1840 being 48.82 per cent.

In other words, Mr. Chairman, there is a larger per cent of imports coming into the United States free of duty under the operation of this law which has brought down upon it the ire of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] than under any law in the history of the country since 1840, even including the free-trade act which the gentleman from Missouri points to with pride, the Walker law of 1846.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLE. No; I will not.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Why, what is the matter with the gentleman?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, the articles coming into the United States free of duty which make up the aggregate of these articles——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. What are they?

Mr. COLE (continuing). Are the necessaries of life, the necessaries and not the luxuries; and when gentlemen on the other side of the aisle raise the question of a slight increase upon some of the luxuries, I point to the important fact that the rates of duty have been lowered——

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. COLE. The rates of duty have been lowered on the necessaries of life and increased on some of the luxuries.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has declined to yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I thought I could ask him a second time, and the Chair would not take exception to it. If the Chair did not want to ask the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Ohio had already declined to yield.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I wanted to ask the gentleman how many of those luxuries were controlled by the trusts. The people are getting no benefit from your darned tariff. [Laughter.]

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I do not know what kind of leather they use in their Bibles in Missouri, and I doubt seriously if they use that article down there at all——

Mr. HENRY W. PALMER. Which article, the leather or the Bibles?

Mr. COLE. The Bibles. Let us take the question of hides and skins—$104,000,000 worth—and if that is not a necessity that goes into the home of every American workman I would like to know what is. The duty on both leather and paper, every item that enters into the make-up of a Bible, has been decreased. Tin, 27,500,000. That is the article upon which the Democrats defeated William McKinley for Congress in the state of Ohio in 1890, because they sent a lot of cheap tin peddlers around over the country telling the people that his tariff had raised the price of tin cups and tin pans. Now, $27,500,000 worth of that article comes in free of duty.

Mr. BURLESON. Why does not the gentleman put all of that article into the RECORD?

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the privilege of submitting this entire article and inserting the remainder of these articles into the RECORD, every one of which, with two exceptions, is a necessity of life and which is on the free list.

Mr. SABATH. There are no articles on the free list that the gentleman has read——

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. COLE. Mr. Chairman, I shall not take up any more time and shall content myself with the statement that I have made. The rest of the article is as follows:

The total value of all merchandise entering free of duty, which never reached as much as $100,000,000 prior to 1873, passed the two hundred million line in 1880, the three hundred million line in 1891, the four hundred million line in 1892, the five hundred million line in 1905, the six hundred million line in 1907, and in the calendar year just ended was practically $700,000,000, the exact figures being $699,799,771. The principal articles forming this large total of nondutiable imports in the calendar year 1909 were: Hides and skins, $104,000,000; India rubber, $79,000,000; pig tin, $27,500,000; raw silk, $74,000,000; fibers, $29,666,000; cotton, $15,000,000; copper, $40,000,000; coffee, $86,500,000; tea, $16,500,000; cacao, $13,333,000; chemicals, $52,500,000; art works, $13,500,000; and undressed furs, $12,750,000.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I give notice now that I shall make the point of order upon any more political discussions; that side of the House wasted the day yesterday in political talk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. I move to strike out the last word——

The CHAIRMAN. But the gentleman from Wisconsin was on his feet.

Mr. WEISSE. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman from Ohio is inserting his statement in regard to hides I wish he would mention the number of dutiable and undutiable hides.

He could not receive that information from the department as they do not keep a record according to trade classification.

I insert a telegram showing that the department does not keep a record:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 3, 1910.

Hon. CHARLES H. WEISSE,
House of Representatives:

Reports from collectors of customs to this department do not classify hides in the form indicated in your telegram.

BENJAMIN S. CABLE,
Acting Secretary.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am obliged to make the point of order against remarks not direct to the subject under discussion. I did not do it before because both of the Members who addressed the committee are members of the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. WEISSE. I want the gentleman to put in a correct statement.

Mr. SCOTT. I can not be responsible for the gentleman's statements.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I want to say——

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, there has been so much misinformation circulated through the newspapers and otherwise as to the free distribution of vegetable and flower seed by the Government, as to the cost of the seed, the number of packages, and the cost of franking the seeds through the mails that I thought it worth while to have a statement from the Secretary of Agriculture as to the number of packages of such seed, the total weight of the seed, including containers or envelopes, and the average weight of packages. So on the 22d of January of this year I wrote the Secretary for this information, and I now read his reply to my inquiry:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D. C., January 29, 1910.

Hon. T. W. SIMS,
House of Representatives.

SIR: In compliance with your request of January 22, 1910, I inclose herewith a memorandum showing the total weight of the seeds and their containers which enter into the congressional seed distribution for the present year. From this statement you will note that the average weight per package of vegetable seed is 2.16 ounces, and that the average weight per package of flower seed is 0.653 ounce.

Trusting that this information will fully answer your purpose, I am,

Very respectfully,

W. M. HAYS, Acting Secretary.

Seventy-six thousand and seventy-three pounds (total weight) divided by 1,863,000 (total number of packages) gives 0.653 ounces as average weight per package, or 40.83 pounds as average weight per thousand packages.

By reference to the letter I have just read from the Acting Secretary of Agriculture it is seen that the total weight of all the vegetable seed, including the weight of the containers, or envelopes, is 1,351,390 pounds; that the average weight of each package is 2.15 ounces, or practically 2 ounces to the package; that the average weight of a package of flower seed is about one-half ounce, including weight of wrapper or container; that the total weight of all flower seed is 76,073 pounds; that if postage was paid on all the vegetable seed sent out by congressional frank at the rate paid on second-class matter it would amount to only $135,513.90, and at same rate the total postage paid on flower seed would be only $760.75.

As shown by the report of the Postmaster-General the total weight of the mail of all classes for 1907 was 1,290,358,284 pounds. It is thus seen that the total weight of all seeds—vegetable and flower—is less than one one-thousandth part of the whole. Therefore, the amount of the total deficit for last year being $17,500,000, not over one one-thousandth part can justly be charged to the seed-franking privilege, amounting in all to the sum of $17,500.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Forest Service, $5,043,700.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, by a vote of the House on Tuesday the Department of Agriculture was directed to include the geographical location of each of the national forests in the list of forests printed in the bill, and in order that my compliance with that direction may be a matter of record I ask unanimous consent to insert the following amendment.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 19, on page 49, by striking out the words "three thousand dollars" and insert in lieu thereof the words "three thousand five hundred dollars."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order upon the paragraph.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment because this officer in the Agricultural Department is one of the hardest worked officers in that department. I refer to the editor of the Bureau of Publication. I submit to gentlemen on the other side that the high cost of living now is such that this officer does not get enough, and I think that his salary ought to be raised $500. Officers of like rank in the War Department, the Treasury Department, and the Navy Department are receiving more than this man who does such valuable work for the agricultural interest of this country, and I simply want to say to the gentlemen that I am heartily in favor of raising the salary of this man.

I insist that these men in the Agricultural Department should be placed on the same footing with officers of like station in the War Department and in the Navy Department.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I can cordially indorse all the gentleman from Alabama has said in reference to the efficient gentleman who fills the position of chief of this division, but I do not think that this is the place to increase a salary, and therefore I feel obliged to insist upon the point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. It only raises his salary $500.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. BUTLER). The Chair would like to ask the gentleman whether this salary is fixed by the general law or is it fixed each year by the appropriation act?

Mr. SCOTT. It has always been held that a salary fixed by a current appropriation is existing law, and that an amendment offered to change it is obnoxious to the rule.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman's point of order is good. I do not think this salary is fixed by separate statute, and it seems to me that it can be raised or reduced every year in this appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recalls that quite frequently salaries fixed in appropriation bills year after year have the force of the general law behind them. That being so, the Chair will sustain the point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I have another amendment, to line 21, page 49, striking out the words "two hundred and fifty" and inserting the words "five hundred."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 49, line 21, strike out "two hundred and fifty" and insert "five hundred," so as to make it read "five hundred dollars."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order against that as against the previous amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will be compelled to sustain the point of order.

Mr. HEFLIN. I supposed that as long as the Chair sustained the other point of order he would sustain this one. However, this man ought to have an increase in salary.

The Clerk read as follows:

BUREAU OF STATISTICS.

Salaries, Bureau of Statistics: One statistician, who shall be chief of bureau, $3,500; 1 assistant statistician, who shall be assistant chief of bureau, $2,500; 1 chief clerk, $1,800; 6 clerks, class 4; 9 clerks, class 3; 12 clerks, class 2; 2 clerks, at $1,300 each; 16 clerks, class 1; 10 clerks, at $1,000 each; 6 clerks, at $900 each; 6 clerks, at $840 each; 10 clerks, at $720 each; 2 messengers, at $840 each; 1 messenger, $660; 1 messenger or messenger boy, $480; 1 laborer, $720; 1 laborer, $660; 1 charwoman, $540; 2 charwomen, at $360 each; in all, $104,700.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I find on investigation that there has been left out of the bill just at this point a very important provision, a provision which I amended when I was a member of the Committee on Agriculture, providing that the report on crop conditions shall be gathered from practical farmers. I find several lines in this provision stricken out entirely. In the outset of this bill it says that—

The following sums be, and are hereby, appropriated, out of the money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, in full compensation for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1910, for the purposes and objects expressly named in this bill.

Now, this object is not named in the bill, and I submit to this House that the reports on crop conditions, so far as the South is concerned, were more accurate last year and came nearer the truth than at any time in the history of the Agricultural Department or since these reports have been obtained.

I suppose it was an oversight, because some of the Members I discussed it with say that the matter was not mentioned in the committee at all, and I mentioned it to the chairman of the committee, who finally said he thought it was provided for in another law. As I understand it, each bill stands or falls upon the provisions contained in it, and unless this provision is contained in this bill I fear that it is not the law. And representing, as I do, a part of the great agricultural interests of the South, and in the name of justice to the farmers, who know more about crop conditions and who can obtain the truth more readily and more nearly than anybody——

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN (continuing). I want this provision put back.

Mr. TAWNEY. If the gentleman could be satisfied that the provision which is contained in the current agricultural appropriation act was permanent law, and therefore did not need to be included, would that satisfy him?

Mr. HEFLIN. Certainly; but until I am convinced of that I shall insist that the provision be put back in this bill. I have been told that——

Mr. TAWNEY. Is it not the opportunity to make a speech in behalf of this provision that you hate to let go by? As a matter of fact, the law now authorizes what the gentleman is contending for.

Mr. HEFLIN. I differ with the gentleman, Mr. Chairman, because this bill expressly says in the outset that the purposes set out in this bill are appropriated for, and none other. No, sir; it was not my desire to make a speech that moved me in this matter, but I could speak and speak, if you will give me the time, every hour in the day from now until we adjourn, exposing Republican rottenness in this House and your oppression of the farmers of this country. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It is in the interest of a certainty and in the interest of fairness to the farmers that I demand that this provision go back. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I do not see why it was stricken out. It can not do any harm to put it back. It is the safest thing to do, and there is a question in my mind, if it is left out, whether or not it is the law.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HEFLIN. I will.

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman aware of the fact that it has been the constant holding of the department and of the Comptroller, who is the one that finally decides on language like this, "that hereafter such and such will be the case," that this constitutes permanent law and that it is not necessary to repeat it in the appropriation bill every year?

Mr. HEFLIN. No, sir; I am not aware of the fact that that is the custom or the holding of the department.

Mr. MANN. Is not the gentleman satisfied with his victory of last year——

Mr. HEFLIN. I am; but it takes eternal vigilance here to hold a victory. I want to be sure.

Mr. MANN (continuing). In inserting this provision as permanent law rather than as in a mere appropriation bill?

Mr. HEFLIN. I am, if it is permanent. I wanted to be sure of that.

Mr. MANN. It is permanent law and can not be considered otherwise.

Mr. HEFLIN. Well, I wanted the House and the country to have full knowledge of the fact that the provision is not contained in this bill. I hope the gentleman from Illinois is right and that it will be held to be the law, and I value the gentleman's opinion. I have done my duty in regard to the matter.

Mr. MANN. To insert it year by year in the appropriation act might be taken as an intention of Congress to construe it as not permanent law, and would weaken the effect of the gentleman's amendment of last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HEFLIN. I move to strike out the last word.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it was merely my purpose to raise this important question, and I did it in good faith. I discovered it was left out of the bill. I then mentioned it to every Democrat on the committee, and all of them said that it was never called to their attention. I mentioned it to one Republican, and he said it was never mentioned; and I wanted the House to know that it had been omitted from the bill. I am glad to have the expression of gentlemen that it is their belief that it is the law. I wanted to enter my protest against its being stricken out, so that if anything should happen hereafter the country should know that I was attending to my duty and looking after the interests of the farmer.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman from Alabama is probably the only Member of the House who is not aware that when the word "hereafter" is applied to any provision in an appropriation bill it has always been construed as making it permanent law. This proviso appeared in the current law in this form:

Provided, That hereafter monthly crop reports, which shall be gathered as far as possible from practical farmers, and which shall be issued about the 10th of each month—

And so forth.

That language was repeated in the estimates this year, but it was inclosed in heavy brackets, showing that the department believed that it was no longer necessary to include it in the appropriation bill. It was therefore laid before every member of the committee, and none of us had any doubt, in view of the fact that it contained the word "hereafter," that it was and is permanent law.

Mr. HEFLIN. I want to ask the gentleman, then, how he disposes of the language in the bill now under consideration—

That for the purposes and objects hereinafter expressly named in this law?

Mr. MANN. That is the appropriation.

Mr. HEFLIN. That is the appropriation for objects named in this law right here. I want to say further to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] that I discussed this matter with the Democratic members of that committee and that they replied that it was never called to their attention at all, and one Republican said the same thing.

Mr. SCOTT. This proviso simply directs the Secretary how and in what manner the information shall be collected and distributed. The language which the gentleman quotes refers only to the money to be appropriated. The money is appropriated for carrying this provision into effect. The proviso refers to the manner in which it should be used. I will assure the gentleman he need have no uneasiness about it, and if he does not withdraw his amendment I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. JAMES. Was it put in the appropriation bill last year by unanimous consent?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly; it never could have been done except by unanimous consent.

Mr. JAMES. Well, was the original proviso that you say was passed last year, and which you say is law, put in the bill by unanimous consent?

Mr. SCOTT. If any point of order had been made against it, it would have gone out. Do I understand the gentleman from Alabama to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, in view of the assurances that I have from the chairman of the committee and other gentlemen that this proviso will be continued, I withdraw the amendment. I either wanted the provision put back in the bill or the assurance that it is accepted as the law as I amended it last year.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

General expenses, Bureau of Statistics: For all necessary expenses for collecting domestic and foreign agricultural statistics, compiling, writing, and illustrating statistical matter for monthly, annual, and special reports, and for special investigations and compilations, as follows.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask about a provision that has already been read, but I was not here when it was disposed of. I was curious to ask the chairman of the committee something about the status of the provision on page 46 of $300,000 on account of the "continued spread of the gypsy moth." That is a provision that we have had for quite a number of years, I think. Now, I would like to ask the chairman what progress, if any, we are making in this respect? Is the spread checked or is this moth still extending its operations, that we should have so large an appropriation?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, Mr. L. O. Howard, the Chief of the Bureau of Entomology, who has charge of this work, made quite an encouraging report to the committee this year. He stated that the geographical area infested by the gypsy moth had not extended, except to a small degree in a northerly direction. The department has not attempted to limit the moth on the north, because it believes climatic conditions will prevent its destructive spread very far in that direction.

It has been endeavoring, with a great deal of success, to quarantine the pest; that is, to hold it, as far as possible, within its original limits. It has succeeded very well in doing that, and has cleared out a great many sections of forest so completely that the moth is no longer doing any injury there.

The bureau has also been very successful in the introduction of parasites, and it is from these natural enemies of the moth that its ultimate control is expected. Parasites have been imported from Japan and from Europe, and 35 or 40 different species have been acclimatized in this country. During the past summer parasites were found quite thickly spread over an area of about 500 square miles, where they were causing a very considerable mortality of the moth. One or two varieties of parasites have been introduced that attack not only the gypsy moth, but the brown-tail moth also, so that, on the whole, the department reports very gratifying progress in the work.

Mr. PERKINS. Is there any reason to suppose, or does anyone claim, that through these appropriations this gypsy moth will finally be exterminated where its ravages have already begun, or do you do anything more than endeavor to prevent its spread?

Mr. SCOTT. They exterminate it so far as the funds at their disposal will permit. The eggs of the moth are laid in such a way that they are easily discovered and a large number of men are constantly employed to destroy them. But it is believed that the ultimate control of the moth must come from the work of its natural enemies.

Mr. PERKINS. How many years have these appropriations been made?

Mr. SCOTT. I think it was four years ago that we began with $82,500. The next year we raised it to $150,000, the third year to $250,000, and the current year to $300,000.

Mr. PERKINS. So far as the natural enemies go, they are furnished by nature, are they not, whether this appropriation is made or not?

Mr. SCOTT. There were no natural enemies indigenous to this country, for the reason that the moth itself was a foreigner. It happened to get in without bringing any of its parasites along with it, so that a part of this appropriation has been used to send men to Japan and Europe, where the moth came from, and find the parasites which preyed upon it.

Mr. PERKINS. That is, the department has brought over the parasites?

Mr. SCOTT. In very great numbers.

Mr. PERKINS. They have been imported artificially and did not come of their own accord.

Mr. SCOTT. They have been imported by the department, and with very fair success.

Mr. MANN. The main purpose of this is to give further illustration to the old adage that hope springs eternal in the human breast. As long as we make these appropriations we hope that we may discover a method of doing away with these moths, and meanwhile something may come along and really end the trouble.

The Clerk read as follows:

To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to establish and maintain agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, including the erection of buildings, the preparation, illustration, and distribution of reports and bulletins, and all other necessary expenses, $99,000, as follows: Alaska, $28,000; Hawaii, $28,000; Porto Rico, $28,000; and Guam, $15,000; and the Secretary of Agriculture is authorized to sell such products as are obtained on the land belonging to the agricultural experiment stations in Alaska, Hawaii, Porto Rico, and the island of Guam, and to apply the money received from the sale of such products to the maintenance of said stations, and this fund shall be available until used.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. I believe this is the same as the item in the current law. It provided for the erection of buildings, and so forth, and also for the sale of the product, the money to be used toward the maintenance of the station, which is always a bad provision. But what are the facts in regard to these stations? Do they want new buildings, and do they have any products which they sell; and if so, what are the amounts of the sales?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in regard to the buildings, with the exception of Guam, where I think a house of moderate cost has been or is to be built for the use of the director, no buildings are erected except the small temporary structures that may be necessary in the current work of the station. I am not able to answer the gentleman's inquiry as to the amount of products sold at the various stations. In a general way, we can all agree with him that it is bad legislation to provide for a revolving fund of this sort; and yet there seems to be hardly any other way to handle the business in Alaska, or in Hawaii, or in Porto Rico, because a very large part of the products are perishable, and unless they were sold on the ground the value of them would be entirely lost.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to selling the products. I do not see what else they could do with them.

Mr. SCOTT. In the case of other experiment stations in the various States we make an appropriation from the Federal Treasury in support of these stations, and we do not require them to turn back to the Treasury the funds which they may obtain from the sale of the products they raise. In order to put other stations in our outlying possessions upon an equal footing with the state stations, this provision has been inserted.

Mr. MANN. This is a good deal like fancy farming. A man in the city owns a farm in the country, which he expects to support, and yet it seems we ought to have some statement about what we produce in these places and what it amounts to.

Mr. SCOTT. I think the reports of the directors of the various stations contain the information which the gentleman inquires for, but the reports were not made a part of the hearings before the committee.

Mr. MANN. I am sure I do not know, but I have read with interest all the publications that I have seen issued on the subject, but I have not noticed that any of them contain that information. We are spending $28,000 in Alaska. It is desirable to see if we can raise things up there and see what we can raise. But I am curious to know whether we spend $28,000 year after year in order to produce a thousand dollars' worth of some kind of green vegetables. Of course anybody in Alaska could farm on that basis if that be the case.

Mr. SCOTT. As a result of the experiments made in Alaska a very lucrative business has been built up by private enterprise in truck gardening. The gentleman would perhaps be surprised, as I was, to learn that in the neighborhood of Fairbanks there are a great many vegetables which can be grown to maturity, and that that city is to a considerable extent supplied with fresh vegetables from truck farms that lie near it.

Mr. MANN. I am not surprised at that at all. There are many vegetables that grow very rapidly, and it does not take but a few weeks to grow them here. There, where the sun shines for nearly twenty-four hours a day, they grow very rapidly.

Mr. SCOTT. But the attempt to grow them was not made until it was demonstrated by our experiment station that it could be done.

The Clerk read as follows:

Nutrition investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the nutritive value of agricultural products used for human food, with special suggestions of plans and methods for the more effective utilization of such products for this purpose, with the cooperation of other bureaus of the department, and to disseminate useful information on this subject, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all other necessary expenses, $10,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill whether under this provision there is now defrayed the expenses of what we used to call the "poison squad," that was fed on deleterious food to see what happened to them.

Mr. SCOTT. The work done under this provision has no relation to what was called the "poison squad."

Mr. MANN. I want to say that the poison squad was cut out, and it has been one of the greatest detriments that ever happened to this bill. I do not know but that it was the gentleman from New York that made the point of order; I think it was the gentleman from Georgia that cut out the provision for the poison squad, that was worth millions of dollars to the public if it had been kept in.

Mr. PERKINS. I hope that I made the point of order, for if there ever was a provision discredited by men in every walk of life it was that provision for the poison squad.

Mr. MANN. If there ever was an instance of the strenuous influence of the so-called "interests" to accomplish through so-called "scientific methods," in order to overthrow demonstrative facts which were demonstrated under the poison-squad provision, it was in the cutting out of this provision.

Mr. PERKINS. Why does the gentleman say "so-called scientific methods," when the most eminent chemists in the country were called in? Is it because their report was unfavorable to Doctor Wiley?

Mr. MANN. It was not, so far as I am concerned, because the report was unfavorable to Doctor Wiley, although I have a great deal of confidence in Doctor Wiley. I have witnessed expert testimony and the results of expert testimony ever since I commenced to practice law at the bar some years ago. I have just as much confidence in the average expert testimony of a lawyer who testifies as to the value of legal services, or a doctor who testifies in reference to some medical proposition where he is employed to testify one way, as I have in the testimony and opinions given by these eminent chemists who made these examinations.

Mr. PERKINS. By whom was the board of review, appointed by the President of the United States, employed? Wherein would the interests have an opportunity to employ them as experts?

Mr. MANN. That is one thing I have been trying to ascertain—by whom they were employed.

Mr. PERKINS. They were appointed by the President of the United States.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] that the physicians of the State of New York evidently indorsed the work of Doctor Wiley, if we are to believe the newspaper accounts. I noticed a few days ago that the medical association of that State had indorsed the work of Doctor Wiley and had tabooed benzoate of soda.

Mr. MANN. And, Mr. Chairman, the very fact that such a distinguished Member of this House, for whom I have great admiration and in whose judgment I have great confidence, is afraid to have a government official proceed with an investigation designed to ascertain facts, shows that the gentlemen are afraid. I never objected to the special board; was perfectly willing that the special board should continue to acquire information, all that it desires. I have no doube it acquired valuable information, although I do not agree with their conclusions; but that is not an important fact at all. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] and other gentlemen who have been afraid of the final conclusion of the country in reference to the use of preservatives object to the department obtaining information which the people want and which the people ought to have.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not see any question of fear in the matter at all. The only position taken by some has been that omniscience is not always found even in a government employee. When other experts in chemistry may make mistakes, it is possible that even Doctor Wiley may sometimes be wrong; and when it was demanded that if the head of a bureau had issued his edict in reference to any article of food, no one else in the country, no board of chemists, however eminent or disinterested, should pass upon it, or if they did pass upon it, that they must necessarily be regarded, as the gentleman from Illinois says, as emissaries and purchased agents of great interests, then that is a proposition as to which I can not agree with my friend from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. Will the gentleman from New York yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think in this matter of preservatives, eminent gentlemen having decided on both sides of the question, it would be only fair to give the people of the United States the benefit of the doubt?

Mr. PERKINS. What does the gentleman mean by "the benefit of the doubt?"

Mr. HUGHES of New Jersey. If there is some question as to whether this preservative is poison, does the gentleman not think that the people ought to have the benefit of the doubt?

Mr. PERKINS. When the people of the United States have eaten this in the small quantities in which it is necessary for generations, and the race is still in the condition of vigor that it is, I do not think it is necessary to give the benefit of the doubt to any man who says that it never shall be used in the future.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there are two answers to the last proposition. In the first place, the race has not taken preservatives in this way for generations, and not for very many years.

Mr. PERKINS. A good many years.

Mr. MANN. Not even during the lifetime of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. That covers more than a generation.

Mr. MANN. In the second place, there are a great many people in this country now who are suffering in health from the effect of the preservatives that they have taken in their foods unknown to themselves.

Mr. LEVER. And that fact is testified to by almost every scientist except the Remson board.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Irrigation investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the laws of the States and Territories as affecting irrigation and the rights of appropriators, and of riparian proprietors and institutions relating to irrigation, and upon the use of irrigation waters, at home and abroad, with especial suggestions of the best methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture, and upon the use of different kinds of power and appliances for irrigation, and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on irrigation, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all necessary expenses, $70,380.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by striking out the word "seventy," in line 12, page 59, and insert in lieu thereof the word "ninety-five."

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, the effect of this amendment is to increase the appropriation for irrigation investigations $25,000. When this bill was first reported to the House and general debate was entered upon, I gave notice in the fifteen minutes allotted to me that I would offer this amendment, and stated my reasons why. For the benefit of those who were not present at that time, I will state that I desire this amendment adopted for the purpose of allowing more money for irrigation investigations and experiments in the humid regions east of the one hundredth meridian. Last year there were $75,000 appropriated for irrigation experiments generally. This year it is cut down to $70,380. Last year $3,000 of that amount was used in the humid regions and good results were obtained. Experiments are being carried on in quite a number of States—in Florida, Alabama, Georgia, South Carolina, North Carolina, Virginia, and I understand some experiments have been made in New Jersey and some in Missouri.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield?

Mr. CRAIG. With pleasure.

Mr. SCOTT. To whom are these experts to whom the gentleman refers making reports?

Mr. CRAIG. I get a good deal of information from Mr. Milo B. Williams, the engineer in charge of this work in the humid regions, and men employed under his direction.

Mr. SCOTT. Is that done at the expense of the Government or State or individual?

Mr. CRAIG. Why, in a great many instances the State cooperates with the Government; in other instances, as for instance in Alabama, an individual is cooperating with the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. But the experiments are initiated by the Government?

Mr. CRAIG. I do not think they have been initiated by the Government. I asked them to come down—I might say that I initiated the one in Alabama, in part.

Mr. SCOTT. At any rate, they are all participated in to some degree by the Government?

Mr. CRAIG. That is my information, that they are all participated in to some degree, and to how small a degree the House will readily realize when I state I was informed by the man at the head of this work, who directed the experiment in my district, that he had allotted more money to the experiments in my district than he had to any other; he had allotted $100 to the man in my district, so you can imagine the vast extent to which the Government has participated in these experiments. Last year the cotton crop of Alabama amounted to 1,263,953 bales. This year, almost solely on account of the drought which came the latter part of August and lasted through September and up through part of October, the cotton crop was reduced to 987,254 bales, nearly 300,000 bales of cotton less. At $80 a bale it is very easy to see the immense loss that was occasioned in this one industry in one State by reason of not being able to supplement the rainfall. It might seem a little new to some persons to speak of irrigation in a country where there is ordinarily a good rainfall; but it will not seem unusual or in any degree strange when I tell you that in some years in the humid regions we have nearly all the rainfall in the first few months of the spring; and very often in the latter part of the summer, when the crops are really being made and need the most moisture, they get absolutely none and it occasions great loss. The loss which was occasioned this crop year was by reason of just such conditions.

Now, the farmers in the southern part of the humid region, and as I understand in other parts of the humid region, are taking a great deal of interest in the matter and they want to know something about irrigation. There is appropriated by this bill for the investigation of dry-land farming $31,730, investigation of reclamation lands $74,380, and the amount to be expended under this paragraph in the West, figuring the same proportion as expended in the humid regions last year and adding $500 thereto, is $66,880, making a total of $172,990 for irrigation experiments and investigations, or investigations of that nature, in the arid and semiarid regions. It is not at all unreasonable for the humid region to ask and to receive at least $30,000 in order that the farmers may have some instruction in how to supplement the rainfal, which is at times very scarce. Now I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama what is the average rainfall in his section of the State? I refer to the annual rainfall.

Mr. CRAIG. Why, for the last twenty years I should say something like 50 to 55 inches.

Mr. SLAYDEN. The average annual rainfall?

Mr. CRAIG. I get that from the report just compiled. I think it includes all the years from the time the bureau was established up to now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Alabama may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to observe that, in my opinion, the purpose of these irrigation schemes was to inquire as to how they might make crops on land in the arid and semiarid regions, and it seems to me your proposition is drainage rather than irrigation.

Mr. CRAIG. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CRAIG. I will.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. While your rainfall is at times large, as I understood you the other day, you had a drought in Alabama for some months.

Mr. CRAIG. Most assuredly; and that drought cost us 300,000 bales of cotton.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. And that drought reduced your crop by some 300,000 bales.

Mr. CRAIG. Yes.

Mr. GOULDEN. And that drought extended all through the East—up into Virginia, Maryland, Pennsylvania, clear to New York.

Mr. CRAIG. It did; and the farmers of New York, Maryland, Pennsylvania, and Virginia suffered like our farmers did.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is undoubtedly true that occasionally we have droughts in this country, but if we proceed on the idea of developing irrigation projects in all sections of this country, where they occasionally have droughts, it strikes me we will bankrupt the Government.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. May I ask the gentleman another question?

Mr. CRAIG. I yield to the gentleman from North Carolina.

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Are not these investigations and experiments also for the benefit of the truck farmer as well as the cotton farmer?

Mr. CRAIG. They are more used by the truck farmers than they are by the cotton farmers. In fact, Mr. Chairman, if the Republican party is looking for a way to cheapen food in this country and they do not want to cut down the tariff in order to do it, which they seem averse to doing, the best thing in the world they can do is to insure by irrigation in the humid regions the truck crops that are grown east of the one hundredth meridian.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN] makes an assertion about irrigation in the humid regions that he would not make if he knew the facts. The gentleman possibly does not know that in the Alpine region of Europe, where there is more humidity than there is in any other part of the whole Continent, there is more irrigation going on to-day, and has been for years, than there is in any other part of Europe. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has again expired.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I represent a district a portion of which does not enjoy the luxury of a rainfall as great as the locality represented by the gentleman who has just spoken, but one in which the question of irrigation is a very important and very practical one. A portion of the district I represent is in what is known as the "semiarid region," the rainfall being about 20 inches per annum, and it is necessary to supplement the rainfall with irrigation, and there is more or less of irrigation in that section of the country.

I understand that the appropriation last year for this work was $75,000. I can not understand why it should have been decreased, and I think that the work is of such importance that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama ought to prevail. [Applause.]

I want to call your attention to this fact, gentlemen: This Government is building irrigation plants all over the West, and you are inviting people to come out and take land under those plants, many of whom know no more about irrigation than they know about the Koran. As a consequence, many people are making failures and are having to give up their claims because of the fact that they do not understand how to use water in irrigation. You have established a magnificent pumping plant at Garden City, and there is a difficulty existing at the present time between the water-users' association and the Government, arising to some degree because of the fact that those people, even in that region where they have been in contact with irrigation, more or less, and have used it to a greater or less extent for years, have not yet fully learned the art of irrigation.

Every man here who comes from an irrigated section understands that men have to be educated in order to effectively use water for the purposes of irrigation. We ought not to invite people to go out and take land under these projects that we are establishing without providing some adequate means to educate, or, at least, to assist them in the matter of education in irrigation. It is a province which the Government may well enter upon. It is akin to many other plans and projects that the Government has entered upon to assist the American people, and as this is so intimately connected with work that the Government is doing in the matter of the reclamation of arid lands, we ought to unquestionably do what we can to assist the people to learn how to irrigate their lands. I certainly hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAIG] will prevail. I believe that the suggestion he has made may well be considered by this House; and in the West, where irrigation is a vital problem, we feel there should be no decrease in this appropriation, but, instead of that, we ought to increase it.

Doctor Fortier, who has charge of these irrigation investigations, is doing a magnificent work. He has a very efficient man at work in my district, one of those bright and active young fellows who are engaged in the government service who are endeavoring to do something practical, something of value for the people, but he is unable to accomplish much because of the limited funds that are given him. I believe this meager appropriation of $70,000 is so small that it is of very little practical benefit. It means that you scatter these dollars over too vast a surface. [Applause.]

Mr. SCOTT. I am sure the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAIG], who offers this amendment, will realize that the situation in the arid and semiarid West is such as to call for a very much larger expenditure there for investigation for irrigation purposes than is necessary in the humid East and South——

Mr. CRAIG. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. SCOTT (continuing). In some parts of the West farming depends entirely upon the question of irrigation. The farmers there would not be able to make a living at all unless they could irrigate their lands; and the question as to whether a certain area shall be populated or not depends entirely upon the development of irrigation. But in the South and in the eastern portion of the country the principal crops can be grown without irrigation. It is only in intensified farming in the East, and in rice farming in the South, that irrigation is practiced or would be practiced in the humid regions of the country. Obviously, it would not be economy for the ordinary farmer to maintain a system of irrigation which he might need only once in three or four years.

Mr. CRAIG. Does the gentleman state that the irrigation systems in Europe which were established in the thirteenth century, and previous to that, have been maintained at a loss?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly not; but the conditions there are entirely different.

Mr. CRAIG. Are not they in humid regions?

Mr. SCOTT. I say the conditions there are entirely different.

Mr. CRAIG. What is the difference?

Mr. SCOTT. The difference is in the density of population. The situation to which the gentleman refers only confirms the remark I have just made—that irrigation in humid regions is of value only in extremely intensified farming. That is the reason it is needed in Europe, because intensified farming must be practiced if the population is to be supported. That condition does not yet exist in the United States; and, therefore, I hold that all that the Federal Government can properly do is to carry on experiments here and there to bring out such facts as will be of benefit to the comparatively few people who might make use of the methods developed. The gentleman has stated in reply to my questions that the Government is now participating in a number of experiments carried on in Louisiana and some half dozen other States that he named. I find, from the report of the drainage office, that $3,500 was expended in that way.

Mr. CRAIG. I think the gentleman is in error. There was not $3,500 expended in that work this year.

Mr. SCOTT. Perhaps the amount allotted for this year is only $3,000. The gentleman may be right about that.

Mr. CRAIG. I am correct about it.

Mr. SCOTT. But the estimate is $3,500 for this year; they are going to expend $500 more than last year. And they expect to expend in addition $2,000 in connection with rice-irrigation work. The fact that the department itself has not estimated for any increase would seem to warrant the committee in reporting the bill in its present shape.

As to the suggestion of my friend from Kansas in relation to the decrease of this appropriation, I wish to state that it is in appearance only, and not in fact. There is an apparent decrease of $4,200, but of this $3,720 is to be transferred to the statutory rolls of the bureau for the payment of employees who hitherto have been paid out of lump sums, and $900 is accounted for by the transfer of one carpenter to the Secretary's roll in pursuance of the plan of concentrating the mechanical force, to which I alluded in my opening statement. So that there will be precisely as much money for this purpose next year as is being expended during the current year. But this is not all the money that will be available for irrigation work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. Is the amount carried in the bill the amount of the estimate?

Mr. SCOTT. Precisely.

I just remarked that the amount carried in this paragraph is not all the money that is available for irrigation work in this bill. The gentleman from Kansas very appropriately spoke of the importance of the irrigation work in our great reclamation projects in the West. But we provide, under the Bureau of Plant Industry, for investigations in connection with the utilization of land reclaimed under the reclamation act, an appropriation of $74,300. So that, as a matter of fact, something more than $100,000 is available for substantially the same purpose as is provided for in this paragraph.

Mr. MADISON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SCOTT. Certainly.

Mr. MADISON. That language you just read differed from this, which is contained in the section under discussion:

> With especial suggestions of the best methods for the utilization of irrigation waters in agriculture.

Does the gentleman say—and I am asking for information—that the same work will be done in the government irrigation projects as will be done under the provisions of this section?

Mr. SCOTT. The "best methods" which the language of this paragraph seeks to develop are the improvements that are hoped to be developed from experiments; and I take it that the experiments conducted in reclamation projects certainly will contribute a great deal to the information of the officials of this office.

Mr. MADISON. Is it not true that that which the gentleman just read refers to plant discovery, the kind of plants that can be best grown there, rather than the use of the water in irrigation?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not see very well how they could develop a reclamation project without at the same time discovering the best methods of using the water. It seems to me that the work carried on with a view to developing the reclamation projects must contribute directly and materially to the fund of information which the investigation provided for under this paragraph is designed to acquire.

But let me say further, in closing, that this work has not just begun, and it will not end with this year. It has been carried on for a great many years, and an immense amount of information has been collected, which is now available for anybody who is going into the arid regions with the expectation of farming through irrigation. Bulletins have been published and books have been prepared; letters can be written in response to inquiries as a result of the investigations and experiments that have been carried on in former years; so that a man going onto an arid or semiarid farm is not left helpless because there is not enough money appropriated in this particular bill to send somebody to sit down alongside of him and show him what to do. He can obtain all the information he is likely to be able to use by applying to the department. There has been no estimate for an increase in this appropriation, and I do not believe an increase is needed in the interests of the country, either East or West. I trust, therefore, that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama will be voted down.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I regret to advise or suggest increases of appropriations above the amounts asked by the department, but I realize that in considering this bill we must take into consideration the fact that the Secretary of Agriculture, like the other Secretaries, was informed that the estimates should be kept as low as possible, and that therefore in some instances the estimates did not include all that the department might advantageously use in carrying on its work.

The work carried on heretofore and that contemplated under this paragraph is exceedingly important. Part of the work contemplated and provided for in the paragraph has largely been accomplished, and in no department of investigation have we had more valuable and effective work than under this appropriation in the study of the irrigation methods of the various countries in which irrigation is carried on, in studying the irrigation laws, institutions, and methods of foreign countries in which irrigation is carried on, and of the various States of the Union, and in encouraging the legislation which has been had in the past few years amendatory of the irrigation statutes of the various States.

I have in mind no appropriation that has led to greater improvement, or that has conferred greater benefit in any field than the portion of this appropriation used for the purposes to which I have referred.

Mr. SCOTT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MONDELL. I shall be glad to.

Mr. SCOTT. Does it not occur to the gentleman that the very fact he has stated, the tribute he has paid to the excellent work that has been accomplished by this bureau, should argue that it has been doing very well with the money we have given it, and therefore does not need to have its present appropriation increased 25 or 30 per cent?

Mr. MONDELL. That is true in a certain limited sense; but I was going on to say that while that field has been fairly well covered in the past, there is still much to do in it. We need still further study in that direction, but the major portion of this appropriation is not now used for that class of work. It is used for the purpose of studying irrigation conditions throughout the country; in advising beginners under irrigation as to the best methods to be practiced, and in conducting experiments to demonstrate the most economical and most advantageous way of using water in irrigation. The appropriation to which the chairman refers has to do entirely with the government reclamation projects.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes.

Mr. SCOTT. I ask unanimous consent that debate close in five minutes on this paragraph and all amendments thereto.

Mr. CRAIG. I ask that it be fifteen minutes. There are one or two other gentlemen who want to be heard.

Mr. SCOTT. I will modify my request, and ask that debate on the paragraph and all amendments close in fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, the item to which the chairman refers is an appropriation for experimental work on Government irrigation projects, and it is used for the purpose of conducting experimental farms. That work is a valuable and important work. It is a practical work, but it applies only to the lands covered by the government reclamation projects, and in many Western States there is but one such government project while there may be thousands of private irrigation enterprises.

The one government project may occupy territory entirely different from that occupied by a great majority of the private projects. Conditions vary vastly as to water supply, as to the character of the land, as to the slope of the territory irrigated, as to the character of crops that can be profitably grown. So that these practical demonstrations and experiments on the government reclamation projects, while valuable, do not cover the entire field, whereas the work carried on under this appropriation is carried on generally throughout the entire country where irrigation is practiced. It is carried on both in a practical way and in a scientific way. It covers the entire field of irrigation law and of irrigation policy and of irrigation practice. It is helpful in the rice fields of the South, it is useful in the intensified farming that is being carried on under irrigation in the East, and which, in my opinion, will increase vastly in the future. It is useful throughout the entire western country where work is carried on by practical demonstration, by investigation and study, and by the preparation and publication of pamphlets and reports, which are widely read and which are exceedingly useful, informing newcomers as to the proper methods of irrigation and encouraging those long engaged in that form of agriculture in improving their methods.

I have no question but that had the Secretary felt that he was at liberty to increase any of the items in the bill above the amount used last year, he would have felt that this was one of the items that ought to be increased.

I know something of the work carried on under this appropriation. I believe they need more money for the economical extension and development of the valuable and important and useful work which they have undertaken. I desire, in closing, to call attention to the fact that we have given only a little more for this work, scattered throughout the entire United States, from Louisiana and Alabama to New Jersey and California, than we have given for the patrolling of a couple of the forest reserves in the West. [Applause.]

Mr. THOMAS of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I do not see why there should not be some increase in this appropriation. This appropriation is used in the investigation of irrigation throughout the arid and semiarid lands of the West and also a very small amount in the humid regions of the South and East. I believe the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. CRAIG] stated only about $3,000 of the whole amount was available last year for experiments and investigations with reference to the irrigation of the humid lands in the South and East.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the chairman of the Committee on Agriculture has been very successful with this bill. I do not believe the bill has been amended at all. I do not recall any amendment, but I agree with the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] when he says if the Secretary of Agriculture had felt that he could have made any recommendation for any increase of appropriation, in view of the Treasury deficit, he probably would have made it for this appropriation. The gentleman from Kansas, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, says that the work has just been begun, and that is true; but because it has been such valuable work those who are interested in the humid regions of the South and East would like to see the work extended and continued. It is valuable in periods of drought not only to the cotton farmer, but especially valuable to the truck farmer. We are interested in my immediate section of the country in truck lands and their proper irrigation. I have seen lands worth only $5 an acre increase in value in eastern North Carolina to $100, $200, and $300 per acre by reason of the development of truck and intensified farming.

We are beginning to experiment in our own way in irrigating our truck crops, but there is a great deal of useful information which might still be disseminated among the cotton and truck farmers of the South in order to show them the best methods of irrigating their lands, both the cotton and the truck lands. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that the amendment will prevail. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Florida. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD some remarks made by a constituent of mine, Hon. J. N. Whitner, of Sanford, Fla., delivered at the horticultural convention held at Council Bluffs, Iowa, on the subject of subirrigation.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The remarks are as follows:

When God made man He made him a horticulturist and put him to dress the Garden of Eden, and the happiness and perhaps the very existence of the race has depended since then upon the tilling of the soil. The failure to produce crops resulted in famine. Crop failures were for want of irrigation to supply failure of rainfall. Until recent years man has, in the main, been content to trust the seasons for "the early and the later rain" to supply the moisture every crop requires.

THE SANFORD SYSTEM.

Civilized man, with rapidly increasing millions to feed, with intensive farming, which makes it necessary to obtain the most and best from his ground, has turned to irrigation. We are amazed at what has been and is being done by private, as well as government, enterprise. And as this great national convention and exhibition is assembled to tell and show what great things have been and can be done, the far

South, even Florida, sends you greeting and bids me claim fellowship and a part in your labors. We have brought some of our products to show you, and I am sent to tell you of our system of irrigation and some of its results. We know it as the "Sanford system of subirrigation and drainage."

Let me describe the system, its operation, and theory; then, with your permission, tell you something of what it has done for us. Its possibilities seem limitless. Without an illustration or drawing a description is difficult to understand or remember. I have, therefore, brought a sufficient number of illustrations, a glance at which will give a full understanding. These are for free distribution at the Florida booth, or will be mailed upon request. Briefly stated, the water is applied through 3-inch tile, laid in parallel ditches 18 inches deep, with a fall of not less than 1 inch to the 100 feet. The distance between the rows of tile varies according to quality of soil; in our sandy loam 25 feet affords effective drainage, as well as irrigation. The more clay and the stiffer the soil the nearer they should be placed. At the upper end of the tile, beginning at the water supply (with us flowing or artesian wells), and running by the end of each row of tile, is a water main, the cheapest being small sewer pipe cemented at the joints. Between the tile and this water main a joint of 6-inch sewer pipe is used as a stand pipe, connected by a short iron pipe on one side with the main, while on the other is the connection with the tile. It will readily be seen that water turned into the water main and running by each of the standpipes can be turned into as few or as many as desired, in this way irrigating all or any portion of the field. Of course the tile is in short joints—with us 1 foot in length—and the water finds ingress or egress at the joints, porous tile being largely a myth. At the lower side of the field the tile discharges into a waste ditch, and when the ground is level and the flow of water not too rapid it will be found that capillary attraction supplies all the moisture needed, even for setting plants; but most fields are equipped with stop boxes at the lower end of tile, and when ground is much broken these boxes are placed at intervals, as required, and the illustration shows how the water is dammed up to any level required, even to flooding the ground.

IRRIGATION AND DRAINS.

This much for irrigation. It is quite as effective for drainage, being laid on an incline and water applied by gravity. In case of rain the excess is taken off very quickly, and on our soil if it rains 3 inches to-day we can plow to-morrow. This we find is of inestimable value, for with the soil saturated with water, as the small boy would say, there is nothing doing, or, as one of you western farmers put it, "You can't get no action out of the ground." The reason of this inertia, as you all know, is that the water excludes the air from the ground. Now, with surface irrigation and without this subdrainage you have to wait for the water to evaporate, which, slowly drying from the surface, inch by inch, lets in a little air from above, while the plants await the life-giving air. With our system, as soon as the water stops running the tile becomes a conveyer of air, which is supplied, so to speak, from both top and bottom. Our system not only does these things, but furnishes warmth from below, and as warm air rises from the tile it has a marked influence on the growing crop, especially in winter, when our most profitable crops are grown, for with us September or October are seed time and February and March the harvest. You can understand that it matters little to us whether it rains or not, for during the winter of 1906 it rained frequently and in torrents, while the next year we had not a single rain from September 15 to April 5, yet raised equally as good and profitable crops. So rain is not necessary to plant, grow, or perfect a crop.

CELERY OR LETTUCE.

As yet our principal crops are celery and lettuce for the northern markets. And I quote from the state department of agriculture for the crop of 1907–8, volume 8, page 129, as follows:

Lettuce, 139 acres, 97,180 crates, $132,587, or $953.86 per acre.

Celery, 209 acres, 209,185 crates, $402,300, or $1,924.88 per acre. Total, $2,878.74 per acre.

I have not seen the report for 1908–9, but the results were certainly as good. These figures, 1907–8, do not mean two years, but one, running from November of one year to June of the next, that being one crop season. Now, with your kind indulgence, I want to tell you a few of the things we have accomplished by this unique and wonderful system of irrigation. In the spring of 1898 I had the honor to ship the first carloads of celery from Sanford, this being the first year we used subirrigation, and the first carload of produce of any kind following the freeze of 1895, which destroyed our orange groves, valued at $100,000,000. The past season from this one point we shipped 1,700 carloads, exclusive of express shipments, making in all close to 2,000 carloads, the estimated income of same being $600,000, from approximately 800 acres of land. It is certain that one brokerage firm, Chase & Co., paid the growers $275,000 for the portion of the crop they handled. We have one grower, C. F. Williams, who sold from measured 5 acres in celery $30,680 in three consecutive years. L. A. Brumley brought 1½ acres, with crop on it, in March, 1908, and in fourteen months sold $5,000 worth of celery and lettuce from the 1½ acres. T. V. Denton, a New York commission man, told me that last season he paid Mr. Allison $1,200 for the lettuce on 1 acre, which was then planted in celery, for which he paid him $1,800, making $3,000 the past season from 1 acre. Is it any wonder, then, that we estimate a revenue to railroads of $700 per acre on our subirrigated farms? And if you will add $700 to the above known yields and tell me what our subirrigated lands are worth, figured on an interest-bearing basis, I will thank you.

VALUE OF LANDS.

As to the value of these lands, ten years ago, before subirrigation was adopted, 1,000 acres of these Sanford celery delta lands were sold for 25 cents an acre. That fall, just ten years ago, H. H. Chappell, being fortunate enough, by the sale of the railroad he was working for, to lose his position, began farming on this then new plan of subirrigated lands, practically without means. On the 25th of October just past he bought 35 acres of subirrigated lands, just across the road from his farm where he made the money, and paid $35,000 for it. He paid in addition for the labor and fertilizer already expended for his season's crop, making the purchase price $40,000 for 35 acres, this 35 acres being a part of the land sold at 25 cents ten years ago. Please note this was no land boomer's sale to a stranger.

This is what has been done in ten years by a people made destitute by the freeze, and most of it in five years. With more brains—and I do not say better brains—more brawn, and, lastly, more money, what the future holds for us requires a more vivid imagination than mine to predict. Now, gentlemen, I invite you to come to Florida; and if you do, come to Sanford and see our irrigated fields and their products, and if I fail to satisfy the most skeptical of the accuracy of every statement I have made, I will pay your expenses for the entire trip. I thank you for your attention.

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Chairman, I am of the opinion that the proposed amendment should not be adopted, for the following reasons: First, that many of the irrigation projects are already provided with lands and buildings necessary for these experiments, and this makes the expense of conducting these experiments very much less on the Agricultural Department. That is, out of the national irrigation fund these provisions are made on most of these government irrigation projects, so that a great portion of the expense necessary for teaching people how to irrigate is made from the regular irrigation funds.

Mr. SCOTT. But the work is done just the same.

Mr. REEDER. Certainly; but it requires less expense than if the work had to be done and the building and lands furnished.

Mr. SCOTT. The gentleman means that $70,000 appropriated for that purpose will do a great deal more work.

Mr. REEDER. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. REEDER. Not until I finish the statement I am making. I want to repeat, that on all the government projects many men are already located who know how to irrigate, and who become instructors to a large extent of the new settlers. Then the information that is gained each year on each one of these projects reaches into the future, so that very much information has been already accumulated; hence it does not seem to me advisable to increase this fund, for these reasons, but the most important reason is that I do not like to have us fall into the habit of giving the departments more than they ask. I now yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I judge from the gentleman's remarks that he evidently thinks this appropriation was used partially at least on the government irrigation projects.

Mr. REEDER. I so understand.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not so understand it.

Mr. REEDER. These experiments are made by the Agricultural Department, and the reclamation fund furnishes the buildings and the land, and the present Secretary of the Interior desires us to put the power of establishing these stations into an explicit law, thinking it is not now provided for in the law as it stands.

Mr. MONDELL. But the gentleman understands there is another item that carries the appropriation for these projects and this is the general item that relates to the country as a whole.

Mr. REEDER. Yes; and to the irrigation projects as well. The Agricultural Department uses this money, as I understand it, for the purpose of instructing on the reclamation projects, as well as those outside of reclamation projects.

Mr. MONDELL. Is not that, then, an argument for increasing it, because we do not have even this amount for the general work?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, if my colleague will pardon me, I think he is mistaken in his opinion that any part of the appropriation under this paragraph is expended on the reclamation projects. There is provision in another part of the bill for work on those projects.

Mr. REEDER. Then, I was mistaken as to the particular source of the funds which the Agricultural Department is using in the experiments.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take the time of either gentleman, but I think I can clear the situation. My understanding is that a very limited portion of this fund, an infinitesimal portion, is used in this way; that some of the gentlemen connected with these investigations do, in an advisory way, assist in the work on the reclamation projects.

Mr. SCOTT. That is quite probable. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to occupy the attention of the committee longer than to say that the appropriation carried under this paragraph has been increased in the last five years from $33,750 to $75,000; that is to say, in five years it has more than doubled, and the investigations are of a character which do not call for a large amount of money. They can be conducted on a small scale, with just as satisfactory results as if the scale were very much larger, and I hope that the committee will not insist in overriding the judgment of the Secretary of Agriculture and the judgment of the Committee on Agriculture by adopting an amendment which provides for an increase in the appropriation of 25 per cent.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. CRAIG. To discuss the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for debate is closed. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAIG) there were—ayes 30, noes 62.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. All in favor of taking the vote by tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number, and tellers are therefore refused.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CRAIG. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "seventy" and inserting the word "eighty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, line 12, strike out the word "seventy" and insert the word "eighty-five," so it will read "$85,000."

The question was taken, and the Chair announced the noes seemed to have it.

Upon a division (demanded by Mr. CRAIG) there were—ayes 29, noes 63.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I offer as a new paragraph, on page 59, between lines 13 and 14, the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Nebraska offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 59, after line 13, insert the following:
"To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to bore artesian wells for the purpose of irrigation, $25,000."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment, or I will reserve the point of order if the gentleman desires to be heard upon it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas reserves the point of order on the proposed paragraph.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the chairman of the committee ought to make no objection to this amendment or to this proposed new paragraph which I seek to put in this bill. As I understand, one of the principal objects at least of most of the items of this bill is to enable the Department of Agriculture to make the necessary experiments in any particular line or along any particular ideas which would have a tendency to advance agriculture in any part of the country. Now, I am satisfied that those of us who live in or near territory where irrigation is used, either in part or wholly, for the purpose of raising agricultural crops, have had a great many inquiries from people who would like to have the Government experiment in localities where they do not have sufficient water from the streams, with the idea of putting down artesian wells for the purpose of irrigation. It costs a great deal of money for poor men to experiment in putting down artesian wells, and hence the individuals, the farmers, usually poor in those communities, are not able to risk the money that would be necessary to be used in making this kind of an experiment.

I do not desire to have the committee understand that I think that the department by reason of putting down these artesian wells would irrigate any large tract of land, but, on the other hand, they would go into the communities where they do not have a sufficient amount of water in the streams and conduct experiments in such places in different localities in the South and West, and when they once established in a certain community that it was possible to get artesian water, the people themselves then would bore their own artesian wells. The only reason the people do not do so now is for the reason, as I have said, that they can not afford to put up the money to be used in the experiment with the risk that the experiment may be a failure. It is a line, it seems to me, which ought to appeal to the chairman of the committee, and one in which the department can well afford to use some of the public funds in order to experiment along a line which if successful would enable large communities to become agricultural communities of the finest character where it is impossible on account of the lack of water now to raise anything in the way of agriculture.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PAYNE. Has not the Irrigation Bureau made experiments of this kind and spent a large sum of money trying to irrigate by the use of artesian wells?

Mr. NORRIS. I think not. I can say to the gentleman that a few years ago I took the matter up with the department with the idea of having them make an experiment in localities where there were indications that artesian water was to be found, and they refused to go into it, and said they did not——

Mr. PAYNE. If they enter upon a scheme of this kind, will it not take a great deal of money?

Mr. NORRIS. That may be true, and they informed me that they did not think they had authority to do it.

Mr. PAYNE. We spend seven or eight millions of dollars every year for the purpose of irrigation, and I do not see why it is not perfectly competent and good faith to try this.

Mr. NORRIS. This is the reason why it is not competent under existing law to-day. They said to me:

We have money which we can use in irrigation, but we know in advance that by putting down this particular well in this particular locality we will not succeed in getting enough water in that one well to lay out a whole plan of irrigation in this community. It will, perhaps, irrigate 20, 40, 80, or maybe, if a really good well be found, 160 acres of land; but the money that we have a right to use in this department is for the purpose of going into the field and laying out large schemes for the purpose of irrigation, and therefore we do not believe we have the legal right to do it, knowing in advance, even if the experiment is successful, that particular well will only irrigate a small amount of territory.

I believe the department is right. I never criticised them for it. I think they took the right view. But this proposition is to let the Government have $25,000 to expend for the purpose of experimenting in that particular way.

Nobody believes, and I am not claiming, that if the amendment is passed that with one well they will get enough water to lay out a large irrigation scheme, but if they get a well in one community that produces a reasonable amount of water, it will mean that every settler in that community will put down his own well and have his own irrigating plant on his own farm.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think that he ought to confine his amendment to exploration upon the public domain rather than upon private property?

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad to have the gentleman's question, because I think it is one well worthy of consideration; but, in my judgment, it is not true that it ought to be confined to the public domain. From the very nature of the experiment I ask for in this appropriation it can do good only in the community where they are successful in finding an artesian well. An artesian well found on government domain would do no good to anybody or anyone unless they were in that immediate community. An artesian well sunk in a place where they use water for irrigation, and where it is necessary to irrigate in order to raise crops for the benefit of all the people, would do just as much good, and more good, if it was in a community where it was thickly settled, and would thus be an experiment that, if successful, would enable every man in the community, whether he was on government land or deeded land, to make the same kind of an artesian well for his own individual use. It is an experiment which, if successful, will do good, not because the particular experiment that, if successful, will in itself do any particular good, but it will demonstrate that in the communities where these artesian wells are found everybody will be able to get artesian water.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on the point of order. I do not believe this is subject to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Nebraska on the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, for a moment before pressing the point of order, I would like to make this statement: There is an enormous expanse of territory in the United States where irrigation is needed. To sink an artesian well at any place in that territory would develop the fact as to whether water could be obtained at the very point the well was sunk, but it would not answer the question as to whether water would be obtained on the adjoining quarter section, or, indeed, the adjoining acre of land.

It follows, therefore, that in order to be of any value such exploration as the gentleman wishes us to undertake would have to be carried on all over this immense territory. There would have to be an uncountable number of wells drilled, and the expense to the National Treasury would be appalling. For the reason, therefore, that I do not believe it to be a function of the Government to undertake an enterprise of that kind, I make the point of order; and I shall be glad to discuss that question with the gentleman. My point of order, of course, is that the amendment is new legislation, a direction to the Secretary of Agriculture to do work which under existing law he is not authorized to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, it strikes me the amendment I have offered clearly is not legislation. It runs along the particular line of the preceding paragraph we have just read. If it is subject to the point of order, then there is no item in this bill in regard to irrigation or any other object that is not likewise subject to the point of order. It pertains particularly to irrigation, and it is one of the means by which experiments shall be made by the Secretary of Agriculture under existing law that gives him authority to make any other experiment mentioned in this bill. I do not think there can be any reasonable claim that this is legislation in any way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The statute provides for experimental artesian wells in the Reclamation Service. That statute, however, requires that the money shall be taken from the reclamation fund. The amendment proposed takes the money direct from the Treasury and authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture to do a work that there appears to be no authority of law now for him to do. The paragraph just read, to which the amendment is offered, was not objected to as being in violation of the rules. That question is, therefore, not before the Chair. But in its largest sense the section that has just been read refers to an investigation of agriculture in its broadest meaning. The proposed amendment goes much further than an investigation in agriculture. It proposes the boring of artesian wells for the purpose of irrigation. The Chair thinks the point of order well taken, and sustains it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Drainage investigations: To enable the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate and report upon the drainage of swamp and other wet lands and to prepare plans for the removal of surplus waters by drainage and for the preparation and illustration of reports and bulletins on drainage, including rent and the employment of labor in the city of Washington and elsewhere, and all necessary expenses, $78,860.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against the paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I will make the point of order, and help the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN. There is no authority of law for this investigation or this experiment. The Agricultural Department, by its organic act or by any subsequent act, has not been authorized to make this investigation in reference to swamp and other wet lands; and while the appropriation has been carried from year to year, and I apprehend it will be carried when this appropriation bill becomes law, I think it is just as well to say it is subject to the point of order, and might properly go out here, considering the desire to stick in a lot of extraneous matters for the investigation of such things.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I concede the point of order. Gentlemen are very well aware of the fact that there are a great many provisions in this bill subject to the point of order in case anybody cares to raise it. I presume the gentleman from Nebraska, who first suggested the point of order, did so in order to test the opinion he had expressed a moment ago—that if the amendment he offered was not in order, there were similar provisions not in order; and the gentleman was quite right in that statement.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, as the gentleman refers to me, I desire to state that I reserved the point of order to give the gentleman an illustration that I was going to do better by him than he had done by me. I was going to give him an opportunity to explain the item, and then withdraw the point of order. I wanted to give him an illustration of returning good for evil. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCOTT. I have not misunderstood the object of the gentleman.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that gentlemen are not speaking to the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not made the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. Gentlemen are not discussing the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. I will ask the gentleman from Illinois if he will not withdraw the point of order, because I think the work is important and should go on.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have no special objection to the item in the bill as it stands, although I think it is a pretty nearly useless expenditure of public money. I thought possibly that the gentleman from Nebraska reserved the point of order in connection with some other gentleman, perhaps, calling attention to provisions where there might be some amendment offered, amendments which would be subject to the point of order, but upon which no point of order could be made after this item was under consideration. If it is satisfactory to let this item stay in the bill in the way it is, I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I was so impressed by the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois that I raise the point of order. Because the gentleman from Illinois has withdrawn it, he can not withdraw it and take that privilege away from any other Member. I was so much impressed with the force of his argument that if he withdraws it I will make it.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman's point comes too late.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, not at all.

Mr. LEVER. The Clerk had begun to read.

The CHAIRMAN. No debate had intervened, and the Clerk had not read. The Chair thinks the point of order is within time, and if the gentleman from New York insists on it, the Chair sustains it.

Mr. PERKINS. I insist on it, Mr. Chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total for Office of Experiment Stations, $1,067,820.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The Office of Experiment Stations is conducting in some of the Western States experiments to demonstrate what can be accomplished by the use of a limited amount of water for irrigation in connection with a nonirrigable farm—that is, they carry on what are called "dry-farming" experiments along with irrigation experiments, in order to show the farmer in dry regions how he can successfully combine the two methods of irrigation and dry farming. This leads me to observe that of all the important and useful movements in this country at this time, and particularly in the western country, that known as the "dry-farming movement" is the most important and promises to be the most successful. Four years ago the dry-farming congress was organized, and it holds annual meetings, at which are discussed the principles of what is known as "dry farming." The term is another name for scientific farming, and it treats of the cultivation of the soil by the application of scientific methods. In the West those scientific methods have for their object the retention in the soil of all the moisture that falls, in order that crops may be grown with an amount of moisture that, except for this scientific cultivation, would not be sufficient to produce an ordinary crop. But this scientific-farming movement is important not only to the West, but to all portions of the country.

The principles of scientific dry farming, deep plowing, subsoiling, thorough cultivation, frequent surface cultivation, cultivation after the crop is planted and while it is growing, all these when applied to worn-out soils, and soils that have largely lost their fertility, are wonderfully helpful in restoring such soils to a profitable crop-growing condition. So that this movement, which had its beginning in the West, and which is now spreading throughout that country, is not only going to be helpful in adding vastly to the wheat area of the country, vastly to the area which can be made productive and support large populations on portions of the public domain now unoccupied, but the movement will, in my opinion, be of vast benefit to people in the East who are studying the best methods for the restoration of the worn-out soils of some of the older States of the Union. This work, thus carried on by the Office of Experiment Stations, has encouraged men to take up public land in the West heretofore considered valueless except for grazing purposes; and the last Congress wisely passed a law increasing the amount of the homestead in certain regions, with a view to further encouraging this dry-farming development.

I am glad to be able to say to the House that the effect of that law has been to open up to settlement large regions heretofore unoccupied. It has brought upon our manless land in many portions of the West the landless man from the Middle and Eastern States, and under the improved methods now practiced in the name of dry farming these men are conquering the desert, making fertile vast areas heretofore given over to the grazing of bands of sheep and cattle, and adding vastly to the agricultural wealth of the country. No bill passed by Congress in many years has been more useful than the 320-acre or dry-farm homestead bill of the last Congress. And no present movement in the West promises more to the future of that region in the way of agricultural development than the so-called "dry-farming movement." These scientific methods must be adopted in much of our western country in order to make farming thoroughly successful. Therefore we shall carry on the work through necessity, which eventually will, as the methods are adopted farther east, be of vast benefit.

The Clerk read as follows:

OFFICE OF PUBLIC ROADS.

Salaries, Office of Public Roads: One director, who shall be a scientist and have charge of all scientific and technical work, $3,000; 1 chief clerk, $1,600; 1 clerk, $1,320; 5 clerks, class 1; 1 clerk, $1,140;

4 clerks, at $1,000 each; 1 clerk, $900; 1 laborer, $660; 2 laborers, at $600 each; 1 messenger, $600; 1 messenger boy, $480; 1 messenger boy, $360; in all, $21,260.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

"For the purpose of encouraging the permanent improvement of the highways in the different States utilized by the Government for rural free-postal delivery, the amount to be apportioned to the improvement of the roads on each rural route not to exceed one-fourth of the total cost of improving such post-roads, the remainder to be borne by the State, county, or township in which said route is located, $5,000,000."

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I reserve the point of order against that.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Chairman, there is no paragraph in the bill under consideration which carries an appropriation for a more worthy bureau of the Government than what is known as the Office of Public Roads. There is no question that since the creation of this bureau of the Federal Government it has disseminated all over this country information in regard to the improvement of our public highways which has resulted in an impetus being given to the improvement of the roads in every State of the Union.

My idea is, however, that the Federal Government should go further than merely to disseminate useful information in regard to good roads. I believe that the time has come for the Federal Government actively to participate in the great work of improving the primary arteries of commerce, those highways over which the farmers of the country transport the products of the land from the farm to the railroad.

One of the greatest drawbacks and obstacles to the further extension and even maintenance of the present rural free-delivery service is the miserable condition of the roads over which the Post-Office Department has to send its rural carriers.

The Constitution undoubtedly gives the power to the Federal Government to expend money for the permanent improvement of those public roads which are utilized by the rural free-delivery branch of the Post-Office Department, and I believe that the improvement of these highways all over the country will confer even a greater blessing upon the people, not alone those engaged in agricultural pursuits, but upon all our people, than will the expenditure of untold millions of dollars for the improvement of our rivers and the water highways of the country. The improvement of the public highways on the land is just as important as the improvement of the public highways on the water, and the plan which I would here suggest is that the Government set aside each year an amount of money not less than that mentioned in my amendment to be used for the purpose of cooperating with the respective States, with the counties, and with the townships for the improvement of the roads utilized by the rural free delivery.

You can call this, if you will, a national subsidy for good roads.

I live in a State which contains the geographic center of the United States, about as far as it is possible to be from those States containing great seaports, States which have great maritime interests which are now asking the Federal Government for a subsidy or increased ocean mail pay, or whatever you may call it, to assist in building up the merchant marine, and I want to say that I am heartily in favor of federal aid for this laudable work both from a business and from a patriotic standpoint, and in return I believe that it would be no more than fair for the Representatives of those States which would receive the benefit of a subsidy for an increased merchant marine to vote for a subsidy for the construction of good roads, to be largely used in the great agricultural regions of the West and South.

During the month of December in 1909 the National Good Roads Association of the United States held its annual convention in the city of Topeka, Kans., and in response to the call for this meeting in the interest of good roads issued by the national association, and in response to the proclamation issued by the governor of the State of Kansas indorsing the movement, there assembled at Topeka nearly 1,000 delegates from all parts of this country, from Alaska, and from the Territories as well as from the States, and there issued from this convention resolutions in favor of the improvement of our highways, which I shall ask permission to set forth in my remarks.

I know that the prevailing sentiment in Congress is perhaps opposed to federal aid in the construction of roads in the States further than the general assistance given in the existing appropriation in this bill, but I believe that there can be evolved a plan of partial federal aid and assistance which will work in the nature of a subsidy and aid and an incentive to the development and construction of good roads all over this country which should receive the indorsement of this House.

I have a bill pending which I am in hopes may be acted upon favorably and which, if so acted upon, will in time give to the great West an object lesson in good-roads construction. The bill I speak of provides for the construction of a military highway between Fort Leavenworth and Fort Riley, the two greatest military posts in the United States, both of which are located in the State of Kansas, 110 miles apart. Large bodies of troops and great quantities of material move each year back and forth across the country between these great posts. At Fort Leavenworth are located two great federal penitentiaries—one under the control of the War Department, for military prisoners, and the other under the control of the Department of Justice, for other federal prisoners. In the course of a short time the labor of all the thousands of prisoners in these institutions will no longer be needed for the work in which they are now engaged, that of constructing the new buildings of these institutions. It will then be necessary either to put these prisoners at work manufacturing articles of merchandise which will come into conflict and competition with the product of free labor or to put them to work upon some public enterprise.

I propose to utilize the surplus labor in these institutions at times when it can be spared upon the construction of this military highway between these two great military posts. The people of my district and of the State of Kansas have become so interested in the project that the farmers in the townships through which the proposed military road will run have held meetings and pledged themselves to furnish to the Government free of charge all of the rock necessary to be used in the construction of the road. Here it will be possible to utilize the surplus labor of these prisoners, and I want to say that, despite what the wardens of some penitentiaries say, it is a boon to the inmate of any penitentiary to put him to work where he can work in God's sunshine and breathe fresh, outdoor air. It is a labor merciful to the prisoner in every way.

So that, if this opportunity is offered, the Government can construct a piece of public road which will have educational value for the people of the West by showing them how to proceed in similar improvement work, and the work on this road can be done with but little extra expense to the Government other than the maintenance of the prisoners engaged in the work.

Mr. Chairman, I trust that this idea of a federal subsidy for the construction of good roads all over this land will receive the serious attention of this body.

Proceedings of annual convention of National Good Roads Association, December 14, 1909, at Topeka, Kans.

ASK NATIONAL AID FOR DEVELOPMENT OF COUNTRY'S ROADS.

[From the Topeka (Kans.) newspapers, December 15, 1909.]

The tenth annual convention of the National Good Roads Association, which is meeting in Topeka, will to-day declare for national aid for the construction of permanent roads. This action will be taken when the committee on resolutions presents its recommendations to the assembly this afternoon. The committee will recommend that the delegates of the convention upon their return to their homes prepare and circulate petitions in their communities and present them to their respective Members of Congress. This committee on resolutions is composed of the presidents of the state associations represented at the convention, and H. W. McAfee, of Topeka, is chairman.

President Jackson, of the National Good Roads Association, and Mr. McAfee, president of the Kansas association and secretary of the national association, are both strong advocates of national aid, and yesterday afternoon stated that the principal resolution which the committee would recommend to-day would be one declaring for national aid.

President Jackson thinks that the National Government should build public turnpikes connecting the capitals of each State in the Union and that the individual States should build good roads connecting the county seats. This would give the country a network of permanent roads that would afford ready and easy communication between the principal cities and towns of the country.

Speaking of this, President Jackson said:

"Suppose the National Government should institute aid for road construction and improvement. I feel sure that work would also begin in every State and in a few years we would have a magnificent system. A road worthy the name should reach every farm in Kansas and this country, if the Government would spend one-half the sum on good roads as it is expending for war purposes in times of peace. I think that it will be shown that any reasonable amount spent by your county, State, or Nation will bring handsome returns. It has been estimated that more than a billion dollars is lost annually in this country on account of inefficient roads. It is a disgrace to our country and should not be permitted."

The convention began its sessions in Topeka yesterday morning with an address of welcome by Governor Stubbs. Representative Hall was crowded. Yesterday afternoon there were between three and four hundred out-of-town delegates registered at the convention headquarters, and many more were still coming in. It is believed that there are a number who have not registered who are in the city.

"That good roads figure largely in the moral and intellectual development of the people of the country, and have been a great civilizer," was the statement made by President Taft in a letter to Governor Stubbs, which was read at the session yesterday morning.

President Taft's letter follows:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, November 16, 1909.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: From your letter I understand you are to have a national good roads convention at Topeka, Kans., December 14 to 15. I take great interest in the movement which that convention is to promote in the development of good roads.

My own view of the good roads question is that it is chiefly a state function, and that all the States ought to unite in an effort to promote good roads. I do not think that the farmers are as much interested in the matter as they ought to be.

The truth is, I think, that the good roads have much to do with the use of waterways and also with the question of railway transportation, because the difficulties of getting to waterways and railways are the great burdens that the farmers have to bear.

I believe that good roads figure very largely in the moral and intellectual development of the people, because they affect directly communication between farmers and the neighboring towns, and the closer this is the more in touch are farmers with the general condition in the country.

Next to education, the system of good roads is the greatest civilizer.

I have no doubt that much remains to be learned by experiment and otherwise concerning the economy in the construction of roads and their durability; but it is most gratifying to have such a meeting as that you are to have in Kansas, which shows a national awakening as to the subject and gives an earnest of progress in the right direction.

Sincerely, yours,

WM. H. TAFT.

USE FEDERAL PRISONERS.

DAN R. ANTHONY, Jr., Representative from the First Kansas Congressional District, at Washington, advocates the use of the federal prisoners for building roads. In a letter read yesterday afternoon, he said as follows:

"There is no public matter in which I take more interest than the movement to secure good roads in this country. I am firmly convinced that there is no economic problem in which the American farmer should be more vitally interested than in the improvement of the public highway. The enormous cost to the farmer of the West in the moving of his crops from the farm to the railway station over the bad roads which prevail in the Middle West for at least six months of the year runs into many millions of dollars, and could be saved by the improvement of these highways. Ever since I have been in Congress it has been my ambition to have the Government use the labor of the federal convicts at Fort Leavenworth to build a military highway to connect Fort Leavenworth and Fort Riley. So far I have been unable to secure the passage of legislation to this end because of the fact that the labor of the prisoners is now used, and will be used for several years yet to come, in the construction of the buildings for the two new government penitentiaries being erected at Fort Leavenworth, but I have secured the approval of the plan by President Taft, General Bell, and other high officials of the War Department, and in my opinion the labor of the convicts at Fort Leavenworth will be put upon the construction of this road just as soon as their labor is no longer demanded in government construction at Fort Leavenworth, and it will be used for the construction of this fine highway before any of this labor is put to work manufacturing articles which will come in competition with free labor."

Chancellor Frank Strong, of Kansas University, spoke at the session yesterday afternoon. Mr. Strong pointed out the fact that while it was supposed that the modern agricultural and road theories were in advance of all time, the Romans knew more about raising crops from bad ground and building permanent roads than we do now. He also said that the Greeks knew a great deal about irrigation.

"We don't know how to build good roads yet," said Chancellor Strong, "and we won't have any good roads until the farmers of Kansas make up their minds to do something and make some progress. I hope that the time will soon come in Kansas when the local community will decide to act. It is the local community that has the power and you can't do anything about good roads until the small communities decide to have them, and will take the responsibility for them."

President Henry J. Waters, of the State Agricultural College, also spoke at the session yesterday afternoon. In his address he said that the need was for greater intelligence on the part of the rural residents and an increase in the production per acre.

"The lack of good communication in winter is causing a constant exodus from the rural districts to the cities, and it is lowering the standard of the people who live in the open country and striking at the vital spot of our sustenance, because our cities are not self-sustaining, and must draw upon the best blood of country life. To stop this exodus, you must keep the people of the country from being isolated two and three months of the year.

"During the past twenty-five years the output of the country has been materially increased, but only on account of the increased acreage, not an increase per acre. To meet this situation—to increase the yield per acre—we must increase the product per acre and to do this means greater intelligence on the part of the farmers, and the first step is to keep the best farmers on the farm."

At the afternoon session Mrs. Charles F. Spencer, representing the Federation of Women's Clubs of the State, read a paper, in which she reviewed the good roads and agricultural exhibits at the Alaska-Yukon Exposition at Seattle. In part she said:

"The Federation of Women's Clubs has always shown its willingness to help in every cause that has for its object the betterment of humanity, and it stands not only for higher culture, but for every practical improvement that makes life more useful and more enjoyable for this generation and for those who are to come after us, and while the women may not go out and personally work on the roads they will be a power in creating public sentiment in regard to the need of better highways."

W. S. Gearhart, state highway engineer of Kansas, in his address at the meeting yesterday afternoon, said that he met a great many farmers every day, and he found that they were not so indifferent to good roads as was generally supposed.

"The trouble is," said Mr. Gearhart, "that the farmers have no organized way of doing road work. Our present road system does not encourage men to fit themselves for intelligent road work. Nowadays, when men do their road work, they go out with the intention of having a good time, and I know of cases where the men have played craps while supposed to be working out their poll tax. There should be a rigid system of overseeing the road work. This should be the duty of the county engineer, and to assist him he ought to have 2 or 3 aids. A county engineer who would take up this work could earn his yearly salary in three months by conserving the money spent on the roads and seeing that it really goes into the roads. Taxpayers do not get $1 worth of work for $1 in money. Sometimes less than 40 per cent gets into the road, and this condition ought to be changed so that the taxpayer gets his $1 worth for $1 spent. To do this, a business basis should be adopted by which the responsibility is narrowed down to one man."

Mr. Gearhart said that two-thirds of the money appropriated for county work each year went into caring for bridges and culverts. He advocated the use of concrete in the building of bridges and culverts and that would end all expense, allowing the money to go into the building of permanent roads that was formerly used in keeping up less permanent bridges and culverts. The end of road work should be macadam, Mr. Gearhart said, but while these were being built good dirt roads should be kept up.

James S. Tustin, of St. Louis, claims agent for the Missouri Pacific Railroad, in an address pointed out that it is not the railroads that are responsible for the excessive cost of getting the grain to market, but the poor roads.

Governor Stubbs, who made the principal address of welcome at the opening of the convention, said that road work should be put on a business basis. In part he said:

"It is a very great pleasure for me to welcome you here for the great Commonwealth of Kansas.

"Transportation is one of the great problems of the day. It is divided into three classes. There are the railroads, the waterways, and the public highways. The railroads were built up because we had to have them first. Forty years ago we were building homes and settling on the farms.

"Now we are doing the things that are building up the Nation in a social way as well as to give profits. While billions of dollars have been put into railways, but comparatively little has been put into waterways and roads. I believe that you are here to-day to discuss a problem which will affect the happiness and welfare of the Nation.

"I believe that it is a good investment to build good roads. I think that we should take a common-sense view of the question. A railroad that is well built pays, while one that is not well built does not pay, and the same will apply to roads. I think that every community of farmers ought to have a man on the roads to make them good, to keep them in repair. When you put this on a business basis and have good roads in Kansas, no one would want to go back to the old conditions."

President Jackson is a strong advocate of national aid, and in his address yesterday morning touched upon that subject as follows:

"It is folly to assume that abutting property owners should be required to pay for the good roads. They are public property and owned by no individual. They are owned by all the people and should be paid for by all the people.

"As the public highways are owned by all the people and should be paid for by all the people, we should have government aid. There was never any system built in any land that was not built by the Government. For many years there has been an increasing demand for national aid."

MR. COOLEY'S ADDRESS.

[From the Topeka (Kans.) Journal, December 15, 1909.]

George W. Cooley, Minnesota state highway engineer, gave an address which was appreciated by the road experts.

"The principal road system now before the people is the stone of macadam," said Mr. Cooley. "This system has been in vogue for centuries. We can't afford now to cover this country with the roads we need.

"The system of tar or asphalt macadam roads is gaining in popularity.

"The two principles in road construction are construction and drainage.

"If you can't get the water away from the road, get the road away from the water.

"We have to depend for twenty-five to fifty years largely on good earth roads, and the question that we have to consider is how to build them with the least expense.

"The secret of the magnificent roads in France and Germany lies not in the construction, but in the maintenance. A stitch in time saves nine; and the people in those countries realize it.

"In Norway and Sweden the roads are of ordinary macadam and most strongly recommend themselves in price and in economy, subject to the objection of faulty alignment, and grades, and the narrowness of the improved portions. The same objections apply to the roads of Denmark."

"In Germany," Mr. Cooley states, "the macadam roads constructed with tar and asphalt binders were most highly considered, while in France the most approved roads are made under a variety of specifications." Concerning the roads of all these countries, including also Switzerland, Italy, and England, Mr. Cooley says:

"The general plan of construction in all these countries for general service roads has been macadam, constructed under the usual approved specifications, bound generally with the finer particles of the principal aggregate, but in many places tar and asphalt binders are used. Such a variety of methods are employed that it is impossible to specialize, but it is apparent from an examination of several pieces of the best highways that the latter methods give the best results. The Great North road of England is, in places, the best example of such construction, and seems to stand the wear of heavy traffic and rapid automobile travel better than any. Roads of approximately the same construction built by the New Jersey highway commission are to all appearances the equal of any European roads."

Asked which roads most strongly recommended themselves to him, from a standpoint of general excellence, Mr. Cooley said:

"To a western American accustomed to the country roads of earth, all European roads are excellent (with some exceptions), but as a rule, in comparing our methods of construction with theirs, we lose nothing in the comparison."

Regarding the systems of maintenance, Mr. Cooley was most strongly impressed with those of France and Germany. He said:

"Roads of France and Germany are constructed and maintained under a rigid system of supervision. Perishable material is enfirely prohibited in the former, and continual repair provided for in the latter. Also a strict accountability is required from all having charge of the work."

Prof. W. C. Hoad, of the engineering department of the state university, spoke in part as follows:

"This country is a big country, and this movement for good roads is a good movement. This movement is diversified. In Massachusetts and Connecticut they have needed and have secured for their country thoroughfares hard rock roads.

"The need is just coming to us, and it is one of the next steps of our progress.

"In the construction of hard roads it isn't worth our while to do all our experimenting before we learn what are the best methods, as we can profit by the experience of others. The same can be said of oil roads. We can study the ground that has been gone over in California.

"Now, there are certain general principles in connection with building hard roads; for example, a good, solid roadbed is a necessity. An other general principle is that we must have some durable material for the road surface. Beyond that there are hardly any principles that can be generally applied; it becomes a local matter.

"The requirement for rigidity or solidity necessitates good subdrainage. It is the result we want. Keeping the water out of the road will help preserve its solidity.

"We do not have the material for road building that they have in New Jersey, New York, and other States, but we do have good limestones, and limestones make good roads.

"They cost less to construct, but do not wear quite as long. We have been running a series of road tests in connection with our laboratory at the state university, and find in many parts of the State are excellent road-building materials. It often comes to the point of which of two or three different materials should be used.

"The matter of thickness of the road is largely a local matter. In the East they have 6-inch roads. Here 8 inches is considered about the proper depth for our limestone.

"The construction of good roads should be along the lines of business—that is, the thoroughfares that are used most are the ones which will justify an immediate expenditure.

"If it can be shown that road construction will more than pay for its cost through a saving to the users, then the building of them is justified.

"It seems to me that our road development should be done by local money and service. This is my own opinion about it, although I know that it will not meet the approval of all road enthusiasts.

"The hard thing is to make a start in good road building, but when we once start it will not be so difficult."

PASSENGER MAN TALKS.

H. G. Kalil, assistant general freight and passenger agent for the Union Pacific, was next on the programme. "We know that the question of good roads is of interest to almost every one," said Mr. Kalil. "The question of good roads is, of course, universal. We have found in handling the freight traffic that if we can get the produce brought to us throughout the year and not have things congested it is of considerable benefit to us.

"If it were not for our elevator service along our roads I don't know what we would do. We appreciate from the standpoint of the railroad good roads, and if the farmers would quit talking politics and would help to get good roads it would be a good thing."

The last address on the morning programme was by Curtis Hill, state highway engineer of Missouri. He said in part:

"The improvement of wagon roads means the improvement of our own property.

"The people of these States have so long been under the impression that road money has been wasted they rather hesitate about putting more money into roads. The money has been lost on account of a lack of knowledge of efficient work. Whenever the general public is willing to submit to scientific and competent supervision and leave politics out of the affair, we will get good roads.

"State tax and expert supervision is the prescription of good roads. There are not more than one out of ten of our petty road officials who have a competent knowledge of roadmaking. It is the fault of our venerable system and not the officials, as they are generally honest.

"Like everything else, it depends largely upon the individual put in charge. Our law is in many places poorly applied, but our law is good."

Mr. Hill is a strong advocate of putting convicts on road construction, and talked at length on this point.

Miss Anna M. Grady, of Chicago, treasurer of the National Good Roads Association, gave an interesting talk, during the course of which she urged the importance of the women waking up to the realization that they can by their influence do much toward securing for the country better thoroughfares.

"I think it is lamentable that the women of to-day, as intelligent as they are, do not take a more active part in a movement of this nature," said Miss Grady. "In different parts of the country the women have banded together in the cause of woman suffrage; that may and may not be all right, but here is a cause they can have a voice in where they are more welcome.

"The children of the country attend a rural district school for a few years, and, in order to attain a higher education, they are compelled to leave home and board, perhaps, in town. This is the starting point of the great trend to the city. The boy comes to the city and, becoming acquainted with city ways, does not care to return to the farm under the existing conditions.

"When the burden becomes too heavy for the shoulders of the old folks, they, too, come to the city to live with their children, and the farm naturally falls into the hands of a tenant, and you all know what that means." The speaker then called upon the men to talk good roads to their wives upon their return home from the convention.

ADVANCEMENT OF ROAD WORK SLOW.

R. J. Clancey, tax commissioner of the Union Pacific Railroad, who substituted for N. H. Loomis, chief of the legal department of the road, spoke on the cost of hauling products to the railroad station and of the benefit of better roads.

"While no branch of the transportation problem is of greater importance than wagon transportation, it is alone distinguished for lack of progression. Wagon transportation is of primary importance because of its essentiality in transporting the products of the farm to the railroad station. The importance of this form of transportation intensifies as you consider it from the standpoint of distance, volume, and cost. The average wagon haul on foodstuffs in the United States is 8.1 miles, and the ton-mile cost is approximately 28 cents. A normal crop of barley, corn, oats, and wheat constitutes more than 26,000,000 average wagon loads and consumes 17,300,000 working days in moving their crop of wheat, oats, corn, and barley from the farm to the railroad station—about $61,000,000. It costs the farmers that amount to move these four cereals named a distance of 8.1 miles.

"To reduce the cost of wagon transportation, the farmer must increase the load tonnage. Two things are necessary for this—reduction of the gradients and hard surfacing of the roadbeds.

"New methods are needed to remedy the lack of progression; the whole system of road construction should be under the direct supervision of the States and Federal Government. There should be national and state highway commissions. Wards of the State, penal or otherwise, capable of physical endurance, should be impressed into good road construction."

George W. Cooley, state highway engineer of Minnesota, made an address yesterday morning and rehearsed some of the principles of road construction and drainage. He also emphasized the importance of "a stitch in time" in the maintenance of the roads.

Clark Hudson, representing the Oklahoma Federation of Commercial Clubs, gave an interesting report of the trip of the Yoakum good-roads special, which recently carried delegates from the good roads associations of Oklahoma, Arkansas, Texas, and Louisiana through the Atlantic Coast States from Maryland to New Hampshire.

The Kansas Good Roads Association met yesterday morning before the session of the regular convention, and a number of new members were added to the rolls. The membership now numbers about 115. An effort will be made, following the convention, to affiliate the state organization with the Southwestern District Association, which is now composed of Oklahoma, Texas, Arkansas, and Louisiana. Missouri will join this association and Kansas has been invited to do so, but no action has yet been taken.

RESOLUTIONS.

The resolutions are, in part, as follows:

The National Good Roads Association, at Topeka, December 14 and 15, believing that among all the appropriations made for various purposes and believing in the organic and underlying principle of the greatest amount of good to the greatest number of people, and that no appropriation made by our National Government could benefit more people than one for the aid of building public highways in the different States, and that the time has come when such aid should be given: Be it

Resolved, That we demand a system or fixed policy by our National Government and an annual appropriation in the States for the express purpose of erecting and constructing permanent public highways; and be it further

Resolved, That we call upon Congress and the United States Senators to enact and place upon our statute books a law looking to that end.

Whereas a letter from Congressman ANTHONY was read before the good-roads convention, in which he advocates the construction of a military road between Fort Leavenworth and Fort Riley by appropriation and convict labor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That this convention hereby heartily indorses the idea set forth in his letter and the effort put forth to bring about the completion of this plan. Be it further

Resolved, That we ask the delegates here present to urge their Congressman and Senator to assist in this movement. Be it further

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to Congressman ANTHONY.

As in many of our States laws exist whereby the poll and road tax may be either paid in in cash or worked out in person: Be it

Resolved, That we demand of our state senators and representatives that they use their influence toward the passage of a bill whereby these taxes must be paid in cash, that better results may be obtained from this money on our public highways: Be it

Resolved, That we demand of our state senators and representatives that they work for the passage of a bill whereby all the money paid into the several States through the state licensing of electric, gasoline, and steam driven pleasure and commercial vehicles shall be set aside for the exclusive use of the improving of our state highways.

We urge the construction by the National Government of a system of permanent highways connecting Washington, D. C., with the capital of every State and Territory.

Whereas Wyandotte County has 40 miles of macadam road and Leavenworth County has 10 miles of macadam within its borders, and there remains 8 miles of unpaved road between the counties, which, if macadamized, would give the public a metal road from Fort Leavenworth to Kansas City, Kans.

Whereas this road is traveled more than any road in the State of Kansas, and it would be of the greatest public benefit to complete this connection between two of the most thickly settled counties in Kansas.

Whereas section — of the Kansas statutes for —— provides for the construction of a modern highway between the cities of Leavenworth and the city of Kansas City, Kans., the same to be constructed by the State with convict labor: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Good Roads Association hereby indorse the plan as set forth, and encourage generally the construction of good roads by the use of convict labor, and that the delegates present use their best efforts to encourage the construction of public highways by such labor: Be it further

Resolved, That such construction be done under the direct supervision of the state highway engineers: Be it

Resolved, That a true and accurate copy of the resolutions adopted by this National Good Roads Congress, assembled in Topeka, Kans., December 14 and 15, be sent to each of our Senators and Representatives of the United States.

ROAD CONSTRUCTION AND DRAINAGE.[a]

[By W. R. Goit, president Oklahoma Good Roads Association.]

To undertake to locate, drain, and construct a railroad, to build a bridge, or a building without plans, would be disastrous, financially and otherwise, and subject one to just criticism, which applies with equal emphasis to road location, drainage, and construction.

Skilled location of a road accurately determines route, drainage, and grades, and skilled supervision and construction intelligently and economically executes the plans of the engineer, and conserves the moneys, resulting in enduring, permanent work at minimum cost.

The use of any material for bridges, culverts, or surfacing of a road that will not resist the elements, and sustain the wear of travel, is reprehensible indeed; such makeshifts should not be countenanced or permitted if permanent construction be intended or desired.

Build for all time, and 'tis cheap at any cost; and where the moneys are derived from the voting of bonds, posterity has every right to expect that there will be something left for them that will at least endure until the bonds mature; but temporary construction and makeshifts, without adequate plans and estimates, will be forever calling for continuous expenditure for maintenance, and prove, as has been demonstrated in the past, "an expensive luxury to the taxpayer."

Education is the one great factor that makes the engineer a necessity in road location and construction. His training for the purpose qualifies him to obtain results; whereas one uneducated and untrained usually leaves us "in the mud."

A mixture of soil or dirt and water produces mud, the depth of consistency being determined by the quantity of water present. 'Tis simply a question of cause and effect; remove and prevent the water from obtaining access to the soils, and subsequent evaporation and absorption will leave only dry soils or dirt remaining after a mud hole is drained. Such a simple remedy for the treatment of a mud hole surely can be applied by any ordinary mortal, though he be not educated or skilled in the work. Where is the mortal who is willing to admit he does not know enough to "run water downhill." Strange as it may seem, there do be mortals who venture where "engineers" fear to tread, who do attempt to run water uphill—a most extravagant and expensive undertaking, never accomplished by the wisest road overseer who ever built a mud hole—and there do be many.

In the location of a road or highway, a survey of the route will locate the road so as to obtain the shortest distances between the two points to be connected. Do not deviate from a straight line between these two points, except where first cost would be greatly reduced by locating on a more circuitous route, either to avoid heavy cuts through hills or high embankments across valleys, or in case property through which the road would pass would be excessively damaged. The less mileage there is to maintain, the less the cost of maintenance. The shorter the distance the less time it requires to cover the road between the two points. All of our railroads built in the years gone by are now making cut-offs to shorten distance, and are reducing grades by cutting through the hills and filling across the valleys to obtain approximate levels, and enable them to draw the maximum tonnage with the minimum expenditure of power—an economical feature which also applies to wagon roads, and could be profitably utilized in their location and construction. Locate the roads as direct as is practical and possible, and to reach points off and away from the direct line or route, locate lateral or branch roads. Under no circumstances, when easy grades obtain, should the highway or thoroughfare deviate from a direct course from the point of departure and the objective point. The direct line or location, that enables the engineer to eliminate grades and obtain required drainage, is the most economical, even though first cost is greater, for the reason that it will require less power to move the tonnage that must pass over the roadway, and less time to cover the decreased or shortened distance. The old adage, "time is money," aptly obtains when a circuitous, undrained, muddy road with steep grades is encountered, though the locator, evidently, was not cognizant of the fact.

After location is determined, grades and drainage follow, and both should receive careful attention and consideration at the hands of the engineer. First, the grade line must be established, to reduce the hills, and fill the valleys, and bring the roadway to a maximum uniform slope or grade, of easy ascent and descent; not too steep, so as to permit heavy loads to be hauled without overtaxing the team, and where long ascents obtain, rests or level sections should be introduced in the grade line at proper intervals, to enable the teams to obtain a breathing place and take the loads off the collars. This will materially increase the tonnage that can be drawn, and be a factor in determining the value of the road commercially, as the steep sections of the road limit the tonnage though the major portion of the road may be practically level. Hence the economy of keeping down steep grades by cutting the hills as far as practical, even at a greater initial cost. After locating route and establishing grade lines, the material necessary for construction of embankment should be borrowed in such manner as to leave perfect drainage in both ditches, and to permit free run-off of the storm water; for perfect drainage and proper diverting of storm waters are the basic principles in the construction and maintenance of good roads.

The question of proper and perfect drainage is an essential feature, and is the principal factor in determining the cost of road maintenance. Avoid concentration of storm water, and do not attempt to carry it long distances in the upper ditch to save the cost of an additional culvert. Dispose of it at the first opportunity, and it will cease to add to the problems that confront us in road construction. When an embankment across a waterway imposes as a dam, and obstructs the free run-off of the storm water, provide a culvert under and across the roadway of adequate size to accommodate the storm water from each drainage area centering at each waterway, thus effectually draining the subbase of the embankment so as to give it a dry footing. Keep the subbase drained and dry and it will reduce the cost of maintenance to a minimum. The one enemy of good roads that must be continually combated is water. Unmolested, it will undermine and wash away the most expensive and carefully constructed roadway, and if permitted to stand in ditches on the upper side of the roadway it will seep through the sub-base and destroy the embankment. Thorough and perfect drainage secures a dry, permanent sub-base, without which a good road can not be maintained with any reasonable cost. Build from the sub-base up. Expensive surfacing of roads with macadam, asphalt, oil or any other approved material, can not stand under travel without a dry, well-drained sub-base, which is the foundation of all permanent road construction, and must obtain.

Storm water conducted long distances in a ditch is constantly augmented by run-off from intersected water courses, and is ultimately concentrated and becomes difficult to handle; whereas if disposed of at frequent intervals, when the volume is limited, and conducted under and across the roadway into the lower ditch or spillway by small, permanent culverts constructed of vitrified culvert pipe, stone masonry, or cement concrete, the concentration of the storm water does not result, and its disposal is easily and economically accomplished and the subbase kept drained and dry. Assist the storm water in following its natural course from each drainage area. Simulate natural conditions, and provide an adequate culvert of sufficient port or capacity to accommodate the storm water that concentrates at each identical waterway obstructed by the embankment. The drainage should then be perfect, provided the lower ditch or spillway is constructed to accommodate the run-off. Fall is the factor that determines the velocity of the water and the carrying capacity of a flow line. Without fall there would not be any run-off to the storm water. Water is acted upon by the same general law that governs solids, and falls precisely as fast. Release a drop of water at a given point, permitting it to fall in space, and at the expiration of one-fourth of a second it will have reached approximately 1 foot from the initial point of release; whereas at the expiration of one-half second it will have reached 4 feet from the initial point of release, falling only 1 foot in the first quarter of a second, and with constantly increasing velocity, is finally falling with a velocity of 3 feet in a quarter of a second, virtually moving through three times the space in the last interval of time, which accelerated velocity is due to gravity. This establishes the axiom: "Fall is the factor that handles water." Conserve it, and utilize it, and you will find it a valuable assistant, as it will decrease the cost of culverts and drainage. Increasing the area of the cross section of a culvert is only obtained at an additional cost, and is neither advantageous or economical. Carefully compiled tables can be obtained from various sources giving the exact capacity in gallons per minute of any size culvert pipe on stated fall per hundred feet. A study of these tables will convince the most skeptical that the capacity of a culvert is determined by the velocity or momentum of the water, rather than by the area of the cross section.

The velocity of water flowing on a fall of 36 inches to the hundred feet is approximately 22 miles per hour, while the velocity of water flowing on a fall of 1 inch to the hundred feet is only approximately 4 miles per hour.

In the construction of culverts, vitrified culvert pipe will prove to be the most convenient, durable, and economical whenever it can be used to accommodate the volume of storm water or run-off. Purged by the fires of the kilns of all that is volatile, and fused together by the intense heat to which it is subject, it is the density of glass, and has all the strength of steel, resisting the action of the elements, and enduring until the end of time. In the construction of culverts where one line of vitrified culvert pipe will not accommodate the run-off, two or more lines can be laid, so as to secure enough port of capacity to care for the storm water originating on the watershed. Care should be taken to utilize all the available fall, that the velocity may be secured to assist in handling the run-off. When the ground is level and the fall is slight, only a shallow ditch should be excavated on the upper side of the roadway or embankment, excavating the majority of the grading material from the lower ditch, which construction will increase or converse the existing fall, elevating the upper end of the culvert so as to obtain the greatest fall across the roadway. When two or more lines of pipe are required to secure enough capacity to accommodate the run-off, the best results are obtained by separating the lines of pipe when placed in the embankment, allowing a space of 4 or 5 feet between them, which will prevent them from being obstructed by floating débris. When the embankment will not permit the use of a large-size pipe, because sufficient cover can not be secured to protect it from travel, the same capacity can always be obtained with two or more pipes of equal area if the same fall be maintained through the embankment from upper to lower ditch.

Example: If only 12 inches of cover could be secured when using a 24-inch vitrified culvert pipe, a cover of 18 inches can be obtained by using two 18-inch pipes, as there is 6 inches less diameter. The area of a 24-inch pipe is 452 square inches, whereas the area of an 18-inch pipe is 254 square inches. The capacity of the two 18-inch pipes on any stated fall is approximately the same as the capacity of one 24-inch pipe on the identical fall. If the road builder desires to increase the run-off or capacity of the culvert, and can secure adequate cover, he can obtain 6 inches more fall or gradient across the roadway by the use of two 18-inch pipes rather than one 24-inch pipe, for the reason that the upper end of the 18-inch pipe can be elevated 6 inches above the flow line of the 24-inch pipe, and still secure the same cover. This will materially increase the velocity and consequent run-off and decrease the cost of handling the storm water. Do not forget that fall has a value, if utilized, that can be computed in dollars and cents; remember that increasing the velocity increases the capacity, and thereby decreases the size of the pipe required to handle a stated quantity of run-off or storm water.

Example: A 24-inch pipe on a fall of 1 inch to the 100 feet has a carrying capacity of 2,396 gallons per minute. Increase the fall to 36 inches to the 100 feet, and it will have a carrying capacity of 14,466 gallons per minute, which is over six times the capacity it had on 1 inch of fall. Under these conditions, if the fall can be obtained, the road builder could use one pipe in lieu of six at one-sixth the expense, which is evidence that fall has a money value, and is an economic factor in road construction. Nature bestows it lavishly at times, and again almost withholds it. If you will conserve and utilize it you will not find it so expensive to handle the storm water. We refer to vitrified culvert pipe particularly, for the reason that an established gradient can always be maintained and a fixed velocity secured whereby the capacity can always be accurately determined. When any other approved material is used in culvert construction, it is still imperative that fall receive due consideration to economically handle the run-off or storm water.

Substantial abutments of brick or stone masonry, or cement concrete, should be constructed at each end of the culvert when either vitrified pipe or other approved material is used for culvert construction.

On level bottom lands no excavation should be permitted to form a ditch on the upper side of the grade on embankment, as it will only provide a place for water to accumulate and stand, constantly seeping into and through the subbase. The better construction on such lands is to borrow all the material for the embankment from the lower ditch and wherever water is concentrated in depressions on the upper side of the embankment, provide and construct a culvert to secure a run-off into the lower ditch. If the embankment is high enough to insure a dry surface court of 18 inches to 24 inches and the run-off of the lower ditch secures sufficient drainage to keep it dry, a good road can be easily maintained.

In the construction of all grades longitudinal or lengthwise drainage must be maintained, so as to permit of run-off from the numerous ruts that occur at some seasons on steep grades or hillsides. "Thank-you-marms" or V-shaped obstructions should be constructed across the roadway at frequent intervals with the apex uphill to divert the water from the ruts to the ditches. On steep ascents no water should be permitted to pass over the embankment. The roadway should slope toward the hill and shed the water into the upper ditch, from which it should be permitted free exit through culverts under and through the embankment, to secure free run-off and prevent concentration and consequent erosion or washing out of upper ditch. This is usually secured by an obstruction in the form of a dam across the ditch immediately below the run-off culvert.

The embankment or grade should be constructed to secure free run-off of storm water and should consist of a berm on either side of the roadway proper to support and sustain the spread of the roadway under travel.

Subdrainage should be appealed to where it becomes necessary to intercept a seep, or drain the sub-base, by lowering the water levels. Common porous drain tile is used exclusively for this purpose by engineers; the tile being laid in such manner as to drain into the lower ditch, where the end should be protected by an abutment.

Absolutely level gradients should never obtain in the construction of embankment on approximately level ground, but slight grades should be secured longitudinally to accelerate and secure run-off from the ruts produced by travel. This can always be accomplished by raising the grade of the embankment gradually from each side when a culvert is constructed, so that the culvert will be at the apex or summit of the grades.

This will prevent any holes and insure drainage of the surface of the roadway. Subsoils should be used in the construction of embankment and when complete the slopes and surface should receive a cover of the surface soils to encourage the growth of grass and prevent erosion of the surface by rut or the run-off of the storm water.

Light wash soil on dirt that is deposited in the draws or depression should never be used to construct an embankment. The usual method of construction of embankments by throwing all the grass, sod, and humus to the center of the roadway, where it becomes a storage for all the moisture it will retain, should be discountenanced.

The relation of drainage to good road construction is so important that every little detail must be provided for to insure the stability and permanency of the construction of good roads. The skill of the most expert engineer is often taxed, and various experiments must be made before success is achieved and the work secured from damage or injury for want of proper drainage. Therefore the employment of the unskilled, uneducated, and inexperienced should be discountenanced, and those placed in charge who are educated for the work.

Drainage is all there is to road building. This accomplished, and you have a good, dry road. What more could you ask for? Macadam! Eh? This is only a question of what your pocketbooks will stand for, but without drainage, macadam would be an extravagant waste of money, and ineffectual.

On the road to the creaking water mill,
Halting, the mud-burdened horses stand still;
In torrents and gusts pours the pitiless rain
On the roadway the builder neglected to drain.
The driver said: "If I had a boat,
I could cross this flood,
But a wagon won't float."

GOOD ROADS.

[By Arthur C. Jackson, president National Good Roads Association.]

Fifty years ago Charles Sumner declared that "the two greatest forces for the advancement of civilization are the schoolmaster and good roads." There is an increasing multitude of people who believe that it is a matter of tremendous import that in the United States bad roads are directly responsible for the loss of over a billion dollars a year and that the saving of this stupendous sum constitutes an economic question of vast importance.

In the year 1890 the foundation of the National Good Roads Association was laid in a state good roads convention held at Kansas City, Mo. The subject of "Charities, correction, and good roads" was discussed by delegates from several States. The sentiment and resolution of that convention recommended to the governors of all States "That the increasing demands of charity for the defective classes and the tremendous increase of criminal arrests in the nation call for stringent vagrancy laws and their vigorous enforcement." Another resolution urgently requested "the cooperation of municipal, county, and state authorities to utilize the labor of able-bodied tramps, vagrants, paupers, and short term prisoners in public improvements."

It has been shown that such labor can be used economically and with good results on quarries, gravel pits, and rock piles in preparing the materials and loading it upon work trains or wagons and in the actual construction of roads and streets. Many States are now making substantial progress in road building with convicts. It is the aim of the National Good Roads Association to continue its agitation of the question until every commonwealth, municipality, and district community shall be awakened to its importance, enact suitable laws providing for this public work, and then see that these laws are enforced. At all times, and more especially during stringent periods, there is a large army of itinerant men who drift from State to State and who live by begging or stealing. They commit nearly every crime in the criminal calendar. Hundreds of thousands of this class are arrested annually, housed and fed and kept in idleness in jails or prisons at the expense of the honest toilers and taxpayers. This is a senseless crime against the State.

During the last nineteen years the Good Roads Associations have held over 2,000 county, state, and national good roads conventions. Vast quantities of literature have been distributed. The public press has printed thousands of pages, ever educating communities while advocating and urging good roads as a substantial asset and as a social and commercial necessity in the nation's expansion, contentment, and prosperity.

The Interstate Association was merged into the National Good Roads Association in convention at Chicago, November 21, 1900. Its objects were and are, first, to associate all who are in sympathy with the good roads movement in a universal demand for the permanent improvement of public roads and streets; second, to secure better results from the millions of dollars annually expended upon the public roads and streets; third, to have established in all States and Territories highway departments with practical engineering supervision; fourth, to secure thorough teaching of highway engineering in all universities and agricultural colleges; fifth, to utilize all able-bodied tramps, vagrants, paupers, prisoners, and convicts in preparing materials and building public roads and streets; sixth, to secure state and national aid for the construction and maintenance of permanent public roads for this and future generations.

On November 17, 1909, the following officers of the national association were elected: President, Arthur C. Jackson, president National Good Roads Congress; vice-president, F. A. Delano, president of the Wabash Railroad; secretary, H. W. McAfee, president of the Kansas State Good Roads Association; treasurer, Anna M. Grady, secretary and treasurer of the Illinois State Good Roads Association.

On May 23, 1908, the National Good Roads Congress was incorporated under the laws of the State of Illinois to associate all interested in a national movement for good roads, and the following call was signed by the governors of 40 States and the mayors of more than 100 leading cities, convening the congress at Chicago June 15, 1908, and Denver July 6, 1908: "Recognizing a well-nigh universal sentiment in favor of better public highways, and believing that a general discussion of this great problem from every point of view will prove timely and effective, the undersigned join in urging all interested to attend the National Good Roads Congress at Chicago June 15, 1908, and Denver July 6, 1908, that the results of its deliberations may be presented for the consideration of the coming national conventions, all legislative bodies, and the public in general."

As a result of the congress, the Republican national convention at Chicago adopted the following good-roads plank in its platform: "We recognize the social and economic advantages of good country roads, maintained more and more largely at public expense and less and less at the expense of the abutting owner," and the Democratic national convention at Denver declared, "We favor federal aid to state and local authorities in the construction and maintenance of post-roads."

The second National Good Roads Congress was held at Johns Hopkins University May 18, 19, 20, and 21, 1908, and in Washington, D. C., May 22, 1909. It was opened by Cardinal Gibbons and addressed by Vice-President Sherman, Speaker CANNON, Governor Crothers, and many of the most prominent men in public life. Among the resolutions adopted by this congress was one urging the construction by the National Government of a system of permanent national highways connecting the capital at Washington with the capitals of every State and Territory, and urging the several States to supplement these highways by another system of state roads to connect the several state capitals with the county seats of each State. It also favored the annual appropriation by the National Government of a certain percentage of the internal-revenue receipts for road construction and the loaning to States by the National Government, upon the application of the proper authorities, of money without interest for road building, the same to be repaid in annual installments. It also urged the immediate adoption of a postal savings-bank bill, in the confident belief that such a measure would yield abundant funds for a complete system of state and national highways.

The officers of the congress are the same as the national association, and the headquarters of both organizations are at Chicago, Ill.

OFFICE OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, December 7, 1909.

Mr. ARTHUR C. JACKSON,
President National Good Roads Association, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I have your kind invitation of the 4th instant to attend the Tenth National Good Roads Convention, for which I have to thank you, and to say that were it possible it would give me much pleasure to be with you at the meeting having for its object such an important subject as the improvement of roads, and one in which this bureau is so vitally interested, but owing to the pressure of public business, greatly to be augmented by the coming Congress, it will not be possible for me to leave Washington at the time mentioned.

With best wishes for a successful convention, and assuring you of my interest therein, I am,

Very truly, yours,

P. V. DE GRAW,
Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

P. S.—If the attached data will be of any use to you on the occasion of your convention, you are at liberty to make any use of them which you desire.

The interest which the Post-Office Department has in the good-roads movement, now generally active throughout the country, and in cooperating with road organizations and rural residents for the betterment of the public highways is the realization of the fact that good roads are essential to the efficiency of the rural delivery service in promoting reliable and uninterrupted delivery and collection of mail in rural communities.

It is a condition precedent to the establishment of rural delivery that the roads over which it is proposed to establish the service shall be in such condition as to be traveled with facility and safety at all seasons of the year, and the department insists that after the service is established the roads shall be maintained in good condition, so as to avoid delays and interruptions. There are now in operation throughout the United States 41,116 rural routes, which are costing $37,500,000 per annum to maintain. Serving these routes are 41,006 rural letter carriers, all of whom, with but few exceptions, travel their routes daily, covering a total of about 1,000,000 miles a day and serving a rural population of about 20,000,000.

Without entering into a discussion of the economic and advantageous features of good roads, but dealing with the question solely in its relation to the postal service, the Post-Office Department is necessarily vitally interested in the improvement of the highways; for bad roads mean an impaired and unsatisfactory mail service and a severe hardship upon the thousands of rural letter carriers and the horses used by them, as well as a vast expense in repairing the wear and tear unavoidably resulting from poorly kept roads.

In the State of Kansas there are 1,771 rural routes of an average length of 27.09 miles. This means that the rural carriers in that State are required to travel nearly 48,000 miles of road a day, or 14,500,000 miles in the course of the year. Is it to be wondered at, then, that carriers complain when the roads are bad and that the department insists that they shall be kept in good condition for travel?

The excuse is sometimes given for a failure to keep up the roads that if they are good enough for those who reside on them they should be good enough for the carrier. These persons fail to appreciate the fact that while they are required to travel from 2 to 5 miles to the town where the post-office is located, and may go when they please and proceed leisurely, the rural carrier is required to travel his full route every week day, exclusive of certain holidays, and to maintain a fixed rate of travel.

For a half dozen years or more the Post-Office Department has been actively engaged in doing what it could within its limitations to secure the betterment of the highways throughout the country, in order to secure on each rural route the delivery of mail with certainty and celerity, and in response to the requirements of the service that the roads be kept up the department has received the hearty cooperation of state and local highway officials and good-roads clubs. The result of this cooperation has undoubtedly brought about a greater interest in the good-roads question, the building and rebuilding of more miles of good roads, and the intelligent expenditure of more money for good roads than any other one fact stimulating the good-roads movement. Hardly a day passes but that one can read of a state or local convention being held in behalf of good roads or some other movement being started to arouse the people to interest and activity in the matter, and numerous invitations are received by the department for the attendance of some of its representatives at such conventions and meetings.

Illustrating the good and immediate results attained through the cooperation of the department which was extended to the Lancaster Automobile Club, of Lancaster County, Pa., in its efforts to secure the improvement of the highways, a letter has just been received by the department from the president of the club stating that within one year the club has succeeded in getting 300 road drags working on the roads in Lancaster County, to say nothing of the interest the subject has aroused, and that the result was achieved mostly because of the hearty cooperation of the rural letter carriers, and that as a result of the success obtained the Pennsylvania Good Roads Association has been formed to secure the improvement of the highways throughout the entire State.

The Post-Office Department is not only willing to cooperate, but will gladly lend all aid that may properly be given in furtherance of the good-roads movement, and desires that postmasters and rural letter carriers throughout the country interest themselves in the movement and give their active aid and cooperation as far as they may consistently do so.

Telegrams of indorsement from Senators, Members of Congress, and governors of States to good roads convention.

WASHINGTON, D. C., December 1½, 1909.

Hon. ARTHUR C. JACKSON,
President National Good Roads Convention, Topeka, Kans.:

I am heartily in favor of national aid for public dirt roads. For ages the Government has made appropriations for waterways and water transportation. For years Congress has donated millions of acres to railroads to encourage traffic by rail. Ninety per cent of the travelers are carried over dirt roads. It is high time that Congress display activity on the good-roads question. I rejoice at the activity of your organization, and I assure you of my heartiest cooperation.

ARTHUR C. JACKSON,
President National Good Roads Association, Topeka, Kans.:

I take the deepest interest in the good roads movement and send you my cordial greetings and good wishes; there can be no more important international development than this improvement which will so greatly add to the productive power of the Nation or more substantially minimize waste in the delivery of its products. Please convey to the members of the congress my best wishes and assurance of my great interest in the purposes of the National Good Roads Convention.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Jackson, Miss., December 10, 1909.

Mr. H. W. MCAFEE,
Secretary National Good Roads Association, Topeka, Kans.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of the 8th instant. I regret being unable to attend the national convention to be held on the 14th. I appointed delegates.

Good roads add greatly to the pleasure and profits of country life. They bring neighbors nearer together, nearer to market, nearer church, and enable them to make all their journeys quicker and better. All costs of transportation from farm to market, and market to farm, lessen the value of the products of the farm and the profit of its owner. Every reduction of this outlay is to be welcomed. The good roads movement in this State is of recent start, but is making rapid progress.

Very sincerely,

E. F. NOEL, Governor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1909.

ARTHUR C. JACKSON, President, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Your esteemed favor of the 7th instant, asking for an expression of my views on the question of national aid to public roads, to hand and noted. I beg to assure you that I am highly in favor of the Federal Government making large appropriations to aid the public roads of the country, provided the law is so guarded as not to interfere with the proper control by the States of such roads.

I am sorry that I will not be able to attend your convention. I have not made any speech in Congress on the subject, and those that I have made at our state and county good-roads meetings were extemporaneous, and I did not keep copies of them.

Very respectfully,

JOHN L. BURNETT.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1909.

ARTHUR C. JACKSON, Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR SIR: I am encouraged and gratified to see that you are to hold a convention at Topeka, Kans., December 14 and 15, and wish it were in my power to be with you.

No more important movement could interest the American people than that of good roads. The problem of transportation is the great problem of the age. Transportation by railroad and by waterways has for many years had the active and generous support of the General Government. The importance of railroads and rivers and waterways is fully understood. The truth is good public roads, generally called "country roads," cut a much greater figure in the advancement of American civilization than any other single factor of transportation.

Good roads reach the homes of all the people. It is a direct benefit to every farmer, in every neighborhood, in every city throughout the Union.

Congestion of population in the cities of the United States seems to be generally considered one of the greatest dangers to American life. The army of the unemployed comes almost entirely from this congestion. The most practical as well as the most valuable way to arrest this movement from the country to the city is the development of country roads.

So accept my congratulations upon your activity, and best wishes for the success of this great undertaking.

Yours, very truly,

GEO. W. TAYLOR.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES U. S.,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1909.

Hon. ARTHUR C. JACKSON, President, etc., Chicago, Ill.

MY DEAR SIR: I am very much in favor of any rational good roads movement and will be delighted to do what I can to help it along. I was born and reared in Kentucky, where they have the best roads in the world, and have spent nearly all my manhood days in Pike County, Mo., where they have 200 miles of the finest graveled roads in the country. Consequently I am in a situation to appreciate good roads and am happy to say that in every county in my district they are building rock roads and gravel roads and greatly improving the dirt roads. I wish you may have a happy and successful meeting.

Very truly, yours,

CHAMP CLARK.

COMMITTEE ON WAYS AND MEANS,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1909.

Mr. ARTHUR C. JACKSON, President, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of the 7th instant received. I am heartily in favor of good roads in the United States, and especially approve the action of the various States to secure them. Our State is doing considerable in that direction now, although it has just started the improvement. In some of the Eastern States the progress made has been very flattering and general, and a great improvement will be found in the roads of these States. I am specially interested in the repair of roads already completed. This part of the work has not yet seemed to have reached perfection in our own State and in many others, and without efficient repair, of course, good roads will prove a failure.

While I am in favor of road building by the States, I am utterly opposed to road building by the National Government. We are going as far in that direction as we ought to in making experiments in trying to advise the States as to the proper construction of the roads.

Yours, very truly,

SERENO E. PAYNE.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1909.

Mr. ARTHUR C. JACKSON, Chicago, Ill.

ESTEEMED SIR: I am just in receipt of your favor in which it is stated that I am urged to send your office a communication to be read at the approaching Tenth Good Roads Convention to be held at Topeka, Kans., on the 14th and 15th instant, and I hasten to reply to say that my duties as a Member of Congress for the next few days will not permit me to take time to prepare a paper upon the subject, and hence I will content myself by saying that I am deeply interested in the cause of improving the roads of our country, and stand ready to vote for an appropriation for that purpose at the earliest opportunity. The farmers support the world, and they ought to have the very best roads possible to haul the products of the farm that they support the world upon to market. Your cause has one "friend in court" at this time, if no more.

With very best wishes for the success of the approaching convention, I am,

Very sincerely, yours,

R. B. MACON.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
COMMITTEE ON INVALID PENSIONS,
Washington, D. C., December 11, 1909.

The National Good Roads Association, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: I submit a statement of my position on this great question.

Truly, yours,

T. T. ANSBERRY.

"The question of good roads is one that takes us back as far as history has preserved a record, and this because the cost of transportation of any product of the farm or factory or mine or taken from the depths of the sea goes a long way to make up the sum total of the cost of the particular article, and therefore has a great deal to do with the personal economy of every household. For all these things or most of them had to be, and now many of them must be, hauled over the highways, and the relation that good roads bear to the cost of living is thus shown to be very close.

"The grangers of the country, however, had this question brought more directly to them, because they had to use the highways to travel back and forth from plantation or farm to the market, and they suffered the personal inconvenience incumbent upon one who is compelled daily to travel over poor roads; result, agitation for good roads, first, purely local, and now it is one of the greatest questions before the American people, and I doubt if you can find a legislator or a taxpayer who is not favorably disposed toward this great movement without much reckoning the cost. I am glad to say that the State of Ohio has taken a long step in the right direction in recent legislation on this subject, and the National Agricultural Department has devoted much of its money and time to construct model roads out of the materials nature has left near by, and the department should have the encouragement of all. I favor this subject, and shall do all in my power to promote it."

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATE OF OKLAHOMA,
Guthrie, December 11, 1909.

Mr. H. W. MCAFEE,
Secretary National Good Roads Association, Topeka, Kans.

DEAR SIR: Replying to yours of the 8th instant, I am in hearty accord with Governor Stubb's call for the good roads meeting, and I am sending a full list of delegates to participate.

I regret exceedingly that as December 15 is the opening day for the sale of school land at Chandler, Okla., which I must necessarily attend, that I will be compelled to miss this meeting myself, but you can mark me as being in full sympathy with Governor Stubb's idea.

Sincerely, yours,

C. N. HASKELL, Governor.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, December 13 1909.

Hon. ARTHUR C. JACKSON,
President National Good Roads Association, Topeka, Kans.

DEAR SIR: I congratulate the association on the splendid work it is doing. The programme of improvement, construction, and maintenance of public roads is bound to absorb the interests of our people in every section. This will become more apparent with the increase of population and the consequent enlarging of social and industrial expansion.

The social and commercial life of the great agricultural sections will be vastly improved by a system of good roads. The producers can market their products more easily and the commercial centers can distribute their goods in exchange to the greater advantage of all. The farmer and his family will make more frequent visits to the village centers; social intercourse among neighbors will be encouraged; the farm will have a greater earning power because of shortened distances to markets, schools, and churches; population between country and city will be more equally distributed, and thus will help to relieve the congested centers. Indifference to the movement will finally be turned into active support when we begin to realize the advantages to come from improved systems of roads.

I am deeply interested in the system of improved roads, and I trust that splendid results will follow from your meeting and that you will be able to propagate the educational programme to all parts of our country.

Very truly, yours, JOHN A. MAGUIRE, M. C.

Address of F. A. Delano, president Wabash Railroad and the American Railway Association, vice-president National Good Roads Association, read at Tenth National Good Roads Association Convention, Topeka, Kans., December 14 and 15, 1909.

It is commonly said that all men act from interested motives, and the public usually assumes that of a man representing a corporation this is especially true. Statements of this kind may be made in a tone of cynicism and disparagement where they carry a bad impression and "leave a bad taste in the mouth." On the other hand, there is a sense in which it is true. A man may act for himself or for a corporation which he represents from a narrowly selfish motive, or he may act selfishly but in a very farseeing way which represents a highly enlightened self-interest. It is the duty of the president of a railroad corporation, as trustee for the owners of the property, to conserve the interests of his company, and in view of the fact that the courts have determined that a railroad is a quasi public corporation it follows that the officer of a railroad is a quasi public official. It is clearly his duty, therefore, to keep in touch with public interests, with the needs of the communities along his line, and to seek in every way to develop those interests. The most intelligent railroad official recognizes that in developing the industrial growth of the communities along the railroad he is rendering the highest possible service to the corporation he represents. It is in this sense, therefore, and in this sense only, that I feel entirely justified in appearing upon this platform.

I will touch very briefly on the problems which are to come up before this congress and which will be presented to you very fully and clearly as the session proceeds.

I. THE GROWTH OF THE POPULATION.

The population of the United States is now increasing at the rate of about 1,500,000 per year. This is 1,000,000 due to immigration and a half a million due to excess of births over deaths. As has been pointed out a great many times, with this enormous and constant increase in population and with no increase in our area, it is evident that it will not be long before every acre of land will be in demand.

II. THE TENDENCY TOWARD CENTRALIZATION IN CITIES.

Everyone appreciates that the tendency toward centralization in cities has been very marked in recent years. You probably know that during the administration of President Roosevelt a commission was appointed to investigate this subject and see in what way life on the farm could be made more agreeable and so counteract this tendency. Railroads are interested on both sides of this question and are therefore fairly in a position to look at it impartially. The cities through which they run are growing with great rapidity, and the growth in business originating at those cities is more rapid than the growth in business at the smaller country stations, but this is not an unmixed benefit to the railroads. The growth of the cities produces a condition of affairs which involves perhaps the most serious problem in railroad management—the problem of furnishing sufficient and adequate terminal facilities in the large cities and still keeping the cost of transportation down within moderate limits. The passenger terminal expense in one of our large eastern cities amounts to 25 cents for every passenger handled through the terminal; in another city it is 20 cents; in another 47 cents, and so on, these terminal expenses alone being more than the total fare collected on a large percentage of the short-distance travel. Furthermore, as every farseeing railroad man knows, the railways are absolutely dependent on the well-being of the entire community. Congestion in large cities means high rents; high rents mean high wages; deficient productivity of the farms means high cost of farm productions, high cost of living for the man who lives in the city, and that again means higher wages and higher cost of railway operation.

This brings me to the third great proposition, viz:

III. PRODUCTIVITY OF THE SOIL.

Jonathan Swift (called "Dean Swift"), writing two hundred years ago, said: "Whoever could make two ears of corn or two blades of grass grow upon a spot of ground where only one grew before would deserve better of mankind and do more essential service to his country than the whole race of politicians put together." It is interesting to note what has been done along this line. In very arid regions much has been done by irrigation and dry farming. In swampy regions much has been done by proper methods of diking and draining. But for the great percentage of our fair land very little has been done in the direction of increasing the productivity, and, what is far worse, the development in many cases has been just in the opposite direction. In other words, we have cropped the soil without any thought of the most simple and well-known rules of crop rotation. We have made little attempt to return to the soil the valuable elements which have been taken from it, and only in very recent years have we gone scientifically to work to find out just what the soil lacked to make it highly productive. The agricultural departments of our Western States, our universities, and our schools of agriculture have done most excellent work in this respect, as you will hear later from some of the speakers; but, at the same time, as we look over the work that has been done and consider what yet remains to be done, we feel that we have only "scratched the surface"—that we have only just begun to do our full duty.

DECENTRALIZATION.

I have already spoken of the tendency toward centralization of the population in our cities and the importance of working toward decentralization. The railroads have tried to help this movement in various ways. One is by the familiar method of some-seekers' excursions, low rates from cities to farm lands, advertising farm lands, etc. The railroads have favored and, I think, should continue to help in any proper way they can anything which will tend to improve and ameliorate the condition of the farmer. I do not mean to say for a minute that the farmer needs any sympathy or commiseration. In the States of the Mississippi Valley farm lands have, generally speaking, doubled in value in the last ten years. Furthermore, during the whole of this time, conditions of life on the farm have materially improved. But, despite this, we see the tendency of the farmer to come to the cities and farmers' boys and girls giving up life on the farm. The argument most frequently cited in explanation of this is that man is by nature a gregarious animal, and that the loneliness of farm life is driving men and women to towns and cities. There is undoubtedly a good deal in this; but at the same time it is recognized that greater comforts on the farm, as well as convenient means of communication with neighbors, will do a great deal toward ameliorating these conditions. The bicycle and the farm telephone have already done much. The automobile will do more. Good state and county roads will do still more.

IX. THE COST OF GETTING FARM PRODUCTS TO MARKET.

The Bureau of Commerce and Labor, in a bulletin issued some time ago, pointed out that it cost the farmer in many States more to get his products to the railroad station than it did to pay freight charges on the products to the market in which he sold them. Undoubtedly this is not true in all the States; for example, in the State of Illinois, having the largest railroad mileage of any State in the Union except Texas, only 2 per cent of the entire area of the State is more than 8 miles away from a railroad track; but assuming that the statement is correct as to many States, it is obvious that if we can reduce the cost to the farmer of getting his products to the railroad station, it will be just as effective to him as reducing railroad rates. The cost of hauling on a country road is assumed by a number of authorities to be 20 cents per ton per mile. This is about 30 times the average railroad freight rate on all classes of business the country over and about 60 times the freight rate which applies on low-grade bulk commodities over a greater part of our country. In other words, the cost of hauling coal or brick or sand or grain or cotton on our average country roads is about the same for a distance of 12 miles as the freight charge for a distance of 200 miles, which is approximately the average haul of freight on railroads in the United States. Good roads are just as important to the farmer as low freight rates; and the value of farm products on the farm is the value of that produce in our central markets, less the cost of gathering on the farm, the cost of wagoning to the railroad station, the cost of transportation to market, and anything which will reduce or tend to reduce these costs will increase the value of those farm products to the farmer in just that proportion.

X. THE SHARE OF TAXATION PAID BY RAILROADS.

In the aggregate the railroads of the country pay, in round figures, $85,000,000 taxation; or, as near as I can figure it, 10 per cent of the total taxes of the country. In some States this is more and in some less. Hence, when any railroad official advocates general improvements, such as the betterment of state and county roads out of the general expenses, it is with recognition that a large share of the cost of this work will fall upon the railroads. Here again the merely selfish view would be not to advocate any such improvements because of the resultant expenditure. From the standpoint of a more enlightened self-interest, it seems to me we are justified in advocating such improvements, feeling assured that the community as a whole will be very much benefited and that the railroads will be certain to share in that benefit.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, the amendment proposed by my colleague is so clearly in the nature of new legislation, and therefore obnoxious to the rule, that I am compelled to insist upon the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, makes the point of order that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas is new legislation, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

For inquiries in regard to systems of road management throughout the United States and for giving expert advice on this subject, $16,000.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 60, line 23, strike out the word "sixteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five."

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I do not offer this amendment for the sole purpose of making a speech on it, but I propose to make a short one, by the courtesy of the committee, nevertheless. I want also to give notice that in addition to this amendment I will offer an amendment to the next paragraph in this bill, to increase the amount appropriated thereby from $43,000 to $75,000.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to preface what I have to say on this subject by three propositions. In the first place, I insist that no one in this House can find any authority in the Constitution of the United States for building a post-office in any community of this land which will not with equal force apply to the building of post-roads. In the second place, I make the statement that there is no highly civilized country on earth with as poor roads, upon the average, as ours. In the third place, I insist that the present movement or propaganda in favor of better roads in this country began soon after the establishment of this bureau, and that its work, more than any other one influence, has fostered that propaganda.

I submit, with reference to the first proposition, that for ninety years there has been no substantial doubt expressed as to the right of Congress, its constitutional right, to legislate for the establishment of post-roads, and I venture to make this assertion, although I believe it will surprise some of the Members of the House, that there has never been a decade in the history of the country, beginning with 1806, when the first appropriation was made by Congress to promote what was known as "the Cumberland road," or that part of the old national road extending from Cumberland, Md., to Wheeling, Va., when as little money has been appropriated or granted by Congress under this provision of the Constitution as has been appropriated within the last decade. In spite of the fact that within that time a Bureau, or Office, of Good Roads has been established, if you will divide all that has been appropriated or granted, directly or indirectly, by Congress for the promotion and "establishment of post-roads" in this country by 9—that is, the last ninety years—I venture to say that the lowest decade will be found to be the last.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman include in that all of the money that has been expended by the War Department in the construction of military roads throughout the United States?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Then the gentleman will have another guess coming.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I think not. That was all done, or substantially all done, in one or two decades.

Mr. MANN. I mean the last ten years. We have spent more money some years on military roads in the last few years than we have ever spent before.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Oh, the gentleman himself has "another guess coming." I do not mean appropriations for highway and wagon roads, but I mean, as I said, granted or appropriated under that provision of the Constitution which enables this Government to establish and improve the "post-roads" of the country, under which, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], all of the enormous land grants were made to the railroads of the West, and they were made under no other authority. The "general-welfare" clause of the Constitution was appealed to, but it was universally admitted that the only authority under which, beginning in the State of Indiana or Illinois and going straight west to the Pacific coast, we granted great quantities of land to the railroads was that simple clause of the Constitution which enables the General Government to establish post-offices and post-roads. I do not propose to discuss further that phase of the subject, because I take it for granted that it is substantially admitted.

Neither do I intend to dwell upon the historical aspect of the subject, interesting as that has always been to me. As matter of fact, as I have said, beginning with the first appropriation of 1806 for the Cumberland road, there never has been a year, or rather no long period of years, in which appropriations have not been made for this purpose.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, as I will make both of my speeches on this and the next paragraph at one time, if permitted, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. BUTLER. Oh, make it five minutes.

Mr. MANN. There is no need of the gentleman's talking on the next paragraph, because I am going to make a point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I am very anxious to finish this bill this afternoon and, much as I regret it, I shall have to object.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the gentleman in charge of this bill, in view of the fact that he permitted this afternoon political speeches for half an hour, should now make objection. I ask, then, with the consent of the chairman of Committee on Agriculture, unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. Chairman, I contend that this and the next paragraph provide for what is essentially the most valuable work of this bureau. The language of this paragraph is "for inquiries in regard to the system of road management throughout the United States and for giving expert advice on the subject;" and the next paragraph provides for investigations of the best methods of road making and for giving expert advice on that subject. I submit to the House that this work of this bureau comes directly within the definition of the gentleman from Kentucky of the proper function of the Government, to which I have heretofore referred on the floor of this House, namely, that this work relates to "the fundamentals" of this matter. Much as I would like personally to see the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kansas, which was ruled out of order, ruled to be in order or made a law, so that the General Government might financially assist in the actual construction of roads, at the same time that is much beyond what is here proposed. This appropriation is to help do what? And I ask if the money of this Government can be devoted to a better purpose than doing what it is here proposed to do, namely, to teach the people of each community by expert advice two things, each of them absolutely essential to their having good roads in their communities.

The first is the best way to manage their roads, and the second is the method of making the best roads that can be made out of the materials they have. I submit to the committee that there is nothing the Government can do more valuable than this. Anybody can make a good road out of crushed limestone. Anybody having plenty of good crushed limestone can grade up a little ridge, put on the crushed limestone, and make a good road. But the point is for the people throughout the country to learn to make the best roads that can be made out of the material they have, and then manage them most advisably, and this is what it is here proposed to do.

Just think of it! "For inquiries and for giving expert advice," $16,000. I suppose that the gentleman in charge of the bill will suggest, as he did a few moments ago, it would be "appalling" to increase it to $25,000. I am just a little tired of this use of that word. The Government is going to be swamped by an appropriation which extends the work of any bureau, for the obvious reason that this House can stop appropriating when it pleases. We make appropriations for these purposes every year, and surely an increase of this appropriation for making inquiries as to the best way of managing our roads and giving expert advice upon the subject to $25,000, and to increase the amount for experiments in reference to the use of materials for making roads, and giving advice upon that subject to $75,000, can not be considered a very serious increase so far as the revenues of the country are concerned, and yet it will be at least a step in the right direction.

The importance of the subject it would be hard to overstate. It is estimated that there are in this country some two hundred and twenty-five to two hundred and fifty thousand miles of road over which the Government in the rural delivery service is today actually carrying the mails. That service has unquestionably come to stay. It is one of the most useful and valuable of all the functions of the Government. It is being, as it ought to be, constantly extended; and the time is coming, I sincerely hope is not for far off, when in the more thickly settled portions of our land every dweller in the rural districts will have his newspaper and his mail delivered to him daily. The increase of this service necessarily must go hand in hand with the improvement of the rural highways. But far beyond and above the value of good roads to the Government itself is their value as a civilizing agency. I can not do better in this connection than to quote the language that I find in the brief on this subjected submitted to Congress by the National Good Roads Association. In speaking of good roads the writer says:

There is no use in making an argument as to the value of good roads. They economize time, labor, and money; save worry, waste, and force; they aid the social and religious advancement of the people; they increase the value of property and aid every avocation, and especially that of agriculture; they mean the ability at all times to move a maximum burden at a minimum cost; they permit the transportation of marketable products during bad weather, when no work can be done on the farm; they save the wear and tear on horses, drivers, harness, and wagons. Good roads are the avenues of progress; the best proof of intelligence; the ligaments that bind the country together in the bonds of patriotism and thrift; they are the woof of sentiment woven into the great web of our civilization; they are to the body politic what the venous system is to the human body. Without it stagnation and decay follow; with it all forms of growth, strength, and beauty prevail. Good roads are the initial fountains of commerce, the rivulets that swell the great streams that flow out of every country and distribute the products of our fields, factories, forests, and mines. They will do more to extend trade and commerce of the country, will add more to the happiness, intelligence, and prosperity of the people, and will contribute more to their social elevation and moral strength than any other material thing whatever.

It seems to me but a matter of justice that the rural districts of the country should receive from the General Government, if not direct financial aid in the building of roads wherever the rural mails are carried over them, certainly every help that the Government can extend in this regard. I have spoken before of the enormous proportion of our revenues spent upon preparation for war and in payment for past wars, amounting to more than two-thirds of the total revenues of the Government. In addition we are spending vast sums on the improvement of rivers and harbors, which may indirectly, but certainly do not directly, benefit the dwellers in the rural districts far from where these improvements are made. In these districts the matter of good roads is of paramount importance; and I therefore appeal again, as I have appealed before, to the Committee on Agriculture to increase and ever increase the appropriations for this branch of the Government's activities. The bureau known as the "Office of Roads" receives in this bill but $114,000. I would like to see one experiment station, at least, in every congressional district in the land—a station where, as I have said, the people of every community can be taught by scientific men and experts in road making how to make the best roads out of the material at hand. In some parts of the country this has been done with great success, and I can see no reason why the Government can not and should not extend this work in every direction and why we should not, as Representatives of the people and of the whole people, gladly increase appropriations along these lines.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the statement of the gentleman from Ohio, and I believe that this committee and the Committee on Agriculture both are in sympathy with the purposes of his amendment. I want, however, to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to this fact, that a committee charged with the responsibility of recommending appropriations, if it does its duty to itself, the House, and the country, must make its recommendations in accordance with the condition of the revenues at the time being. We should not overappropriate, and we have been told from time to time we are facing a depleted Treasury; that the expenses and extravagances of this Government are taking more than the revenues can meet; and it is true, and in this connection I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that he himself personally and as a member of a great party is responsible for this condition of the Treasury. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

I have most carefully watched the course of the gentleman during the progress, slow as it is, through the committee, and I presume, Mr. Chairman, that he marked it out for himself, for the reason that he wished to make the pending proposition to the House, else his course would appear most inconsistent, because during the general discussion, when the chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Kansas, was speaking, the gentleman from Ohio gave us to understand that he had commissioned and dedicated himself to the great purpose of standing by the great American farmer in the consideration of this bill. It did my heart good, in the consideration of this bill, first, when the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON] gave us to understand that he had given it a clean bill of health. It did my heart good because I believe in the farmer and know his need, representing, as I do, an agricultural district, when the gentleman from Ohio gave us later to understand that he had commissioned himself to see to it that the farmers should get a fair deal at the hands of Congress. You can imagine my surprise, Mr. Chairman, to find that when we of the South were battling here for two days for an increase in the appropriation for meeting the ravages of the boll weevil, an insect that threatens one of the greatest industries of this country, an industry upon which depends in such a large measure the clothing supply of the Nation and of the entire world, to find my friend from Ohio voting against that proposition——

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. In just one minute. When the battle was at its very crisis, and the contending forces were surging forward and backward; when everything was in the balance, I listened with my hand to my ear to hear a bugle blast fill the air, for I knew if I heard it, it would be sounded by the gentleman from Ohio rushing to the defense of the farmers of this country; but, gentlemen, the bugle never blared. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. I will yield in just a moment. Again, when I saw my friend from Tennessee [Mr. HOUSTON] offer an amendment the purpose of which was to increase the appropriation for the teaching of agriculture throughout the country, I listened once more for the blare of the bugle from Ohio, and she did not blare. And then——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask that the gentleman from South Carolina have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the time of the gentleman from South Carolina will be extended five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. LEVER. Then, Mr. Chairman, I saw the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. MARTIN] offer an amendment to increase the appropriation for semiarid work, and again I listened for the bugle blare, intently, seriously, earnestly, almost prayerfully, but she did not blare. I thought to myself the gentleman from Ohio must have had a purpose in mind else I should be spared this painful silence, and it is disclosed to-day. He has held back the blare of his bugle in order to raise it in the interest of good roads. And for what better purpose could he raise it? We are in sympathy with him. This committee is in sympathy with him. The Committee on Agriculture is in sympathy with him.

The chairman of the great Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT], is just as much an advocate of that proposition as is the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS], but the gentleman from Kansas knows that the edict has gone forth that appropriations must be pared to the very bone, because the Treasury will not stand for them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Why, Mr. Chairman? Because the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] and the gentlemen across this aisle have been piling for years and years Pelion on Ossa, extravagances in appropriations, which make it impossible for us to appropriate now even in a reasonable degree for the great cause of agriculture. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] in his colloquy with the chairman of the committee makes the use of this declaration, which would give the country to understand that he stood here against the appropriation for the building of battle ships and for those for the Agricultural Department. Here is the gentleman's statement:

Does the gentleman doubt that, instead of building two battle ships this year, if we added $5,000,000 to the appropriation for the various useful bureaus of the Department of Agriculture that Secretary Wilson would be able to spend the money wisely and judiciously?

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LEVER. Yes; but just for a question.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am going to ask you a question. Do you know what you are reading from?

Mr. LEVER. I am reading from your speech.

Mr. DOUGLAS. About what?

Mr. LEVER. About the agricultural appropriations.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It was a speech in favor of giving to this House a chance to look over the whole field of appropriations, and it was on a resolution that I offered.

Mr. LEVER. Let it be born in mind, gentlemen of this committee——

Mr. DOUGLAS. It is only used by way of illustration.

Mr. LEVER. Let it be borne in mind, no matter what the purposes were, that the country got the idea, perhaps the mistaken idea, I am glad to have the gentleman say, that he stood here against appropriations for a large navy because that meant that we could not make large appropriations for the Department of Agriculture. I was interested to know, and this committee may be interested to know, that the gentleman from Ohio is on record in the last session of Congress, the Sixtieth Congress, in favor of a two battle-ship proposition. And yet here we are. We would like to increase this appropriation. We are all in sympathy with it. We know the purposes are good, but, gentlemen, these battle ships have put the Treasury in such a condition that we can not do it in justice to the Treasury.

Therefore, feeling my responsibility as a Member of this House and as a member of the Committee on Agriculture, charged with the duty of recommending appropriations, much as I dislike to do it, I shall have to vote against the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio because his action and the action of his party have made it necessary for me and my party to do it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MADISON rose.

Mr. SCOTT. Will my colleague yield to me to request that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in ten minutes?

Mr. MADISON. I will.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT] asks unanimous consent that debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto be closed in ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I object.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that debate end in six minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SCOTT].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. MADISON. Mr. Chairman, I heard a gentleman who was sitting behind me a short time ago make the statement that he had heard a great many remarks upon this floor in the way of criticism, but he had very seldom seen any Member rise for the purpose of saying something in commendation of anybody or anything. I am only going to take a minute or two of the time of the committee, and I want to take it for the purpose of saying something in commendation of the work of the Good Roads Office. I do not believe that there is a bureau in all the great departments of the Government that under all the circumstances has rendered greater service to the country during its existence than this one. I speak at first hand in regard to the matter, because my people have been the beneficiaries of the work of this bureau. It was stated by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] that the main purpose that this bureau accomplished was in teaching people how to build good roads. He ought to have gone a little further than that and have said they do that by the best means of instruction; that is, object-lesson roads. They send men all over the United States into communities where the road problem is a serious one and solve for them the problem of good roads.

We have more natural good roads in Kansas, perhaps, than in any other State in the Union, but we are confronted in a number of localities with the sand-road problem; and any person who has ever attempted to drive over a sand road understands what it means. Put a range of sand hills between two communities, and it almost isolates one from the other. South of the Arkansas River in Kansas there are ranges of sand hills, and the towns to the north have been almost cut off from those to the south by reason of the sand hills. These men from the Office of Public Roads have gone out in these communities and have instructed these people how to build a sand-clay road that gives them a durable, a permanent road, one that stands up under heavy traffic, and at a cost of about $1,000 a mile. I want to say to you, gentlemen, that it is a remarkable thing, and the results that have been accomplished in these communities have been simply of incalculable benefit. I simply rise in my place to say this word of commendation of the Good Roads Office.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield to a question?

Mr. MADISON. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask you how much you propose shall be carried in this bill—$15,000?

Mr. MADISON. I do not hear the gentleman plainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. And there are about 400 Members in the House.

Mr. MADISON. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I have in my district 48 counties. That would give me about 80 cents and a fraction for each one of them; and if it is to cost $1,000 a mile to build one of these roads, how far would that 80 cents go? [Laughter.]

Mr. MADISON. The gentleman assumes that I am against the amendment.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It might fill up one hole somewhere.

Mr. MADISON. Is the gentleman assuming that I am opposed to the increase in the appropriation?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MADISON. I do not know that I understood the gentleman from Texas. I could not hear him distinctly. I did not say these roads were built at government expense. The local communities furnish the money; the employees of the bureau teach the people how to build the roads, and they supervise the building of model roads, but not with the money of the Government.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I reserved only one minute for myself to close this debate, because I do not think it is necessary to consume any time in speaking to the amendment. I only asked for this one minute because the gentleman from Ohio seemed to be seriously offended when in the plain exercise of my right and, as I believed, in accord with the wish of the House I objected to extending his time exceeding five minutes, and he stated in a tone of reproach that I had yielded half an hour early in the day to a political discussion. He is mistaken in that statement. I yielded only ten minutes to political debate, five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUCKER] and five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COLE], because both are members of the Committee on Agriculture, and I did not wish to seem discourteous to them.

Touching the pending amendment, I desire merely to remind the House that within the past five years this appropriation has grown from $37,000 to $100,000, and the committee believes the amount in the current law will be amply sufficient to carry forward the work that must be done during the coming year.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I move to strike out the last word, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking unanimous consent to print in the RECORD a document entitled "Corporation-Tax Circular No. 2" of "the Illinois Manufacturers' Association." I wish to read but one or two sentences from it, to show gentlemen of the House what it purports to be. It is headed, "Repeal the corporation-tax law—Quick action on your part will produce the result." Then it goes on to say:

Fully 60 per cent of the Members of Congress believe the corporation-tax law is unjust, inquisitorial, and discriminatory. Fully 40 per cent are ready to vote now for its repeal.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his point of order.

Mr. MANN. Well, of course, debate is really out of order. I have no objection to giving the gentleman unanimous consent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am perfectly willing, I will say to the gentleman——

Mr. MANN. My point of order is made for the purpose of preventing a protracted political debate in the House.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have no intention of making a political speech at all or leading up to a political debate.

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the point of order, as far as the gentleman is concerned.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I thank the gentleman. I merely want to call the attention of the House to this sort of propaganda. The entire circular is as follows:

Corporation-Tax Circular No. 2.

ILLINOIS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION,
Chicago, January 22, 1910.

REPEAL THE CORPORATION-TAX LAW.

QUICK ACTION ON YOUR PART WILL PRODUCE THE RESULT.

Fully 60 per cent of the Members of Congress believe the corporation-tax law is unjust, inquisitorial, and discriminatory. Fully 40 per cent are ready to vote now for its repeal.

The returns received at this office in reply to our letter of January 6 indicate the foregoing facts, and are encouraging. Please write your Senators and Congressmen again and urge action. Bring to their attention that they are under more obligation to their constituents than they are to the administration. Point out that the administration can give them no votes in the districts in which they reside.

Please send a contribution for $25, or such amount as you care to contribute, unless you have already contributed, to aid in the campaign. It takes postage and printing to bring this matter to the attention of all the corporations in the United States.

The conference called under the auspices of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association in this city Friday, January 14, was a great success. Do you want a copy of the proceedings? It will be mailed upon request.

Subjoined is a copy of the resolutions, a list of the committee named to conduct the campaign, and copies of the repealing measure offered by Congressman SOUTHWICK, of Albany, and the bill to extend the time introduced by Congressman COUDREY, of St. Louis.

JOHN M. GLENN, Secretary.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON RESOLUTIONS.

Whereas at a conference of representatives of corporate industries, commercial organizations representing various sections of the country, and individual corporations, held at Chicago, Ill., on the 14th day of January, 1910, under the auspices of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, the corporate-tax law of August 5, 1909, has been carefully discussed and considered from every standpoint; and

Whereas the representatives of this conference are of the unanimous opinion that this law, as framed, is inimical not only to the interests of those represented but to the country at large, as being at variance with established rights and principles, and especially as infringing upon the domain of the sovereignty of the various States, as discriminating between individuals operating as individuals and those operating through corporate bodies, as granting to the Federal Congress the right, by and through a tax on corporate operations, to find a means to create revenues which might lead to excessive government expenditures, and especially obnoxious by reason of the publicity which the law would give to corporate business as opposed to that which is carried on by partnerships and individual enterprise: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the unqualified indorsement of this conference be given to the efforts which are being made for the absolute repeal of this act; and be it further

Resolved, That the members of this conference pledge themselves to exercise their utmost endeavor to secure the cooperation of other bodies and other interests toward such repeal; that every member of this conference pledge himself to bring all possible influence to bear upon the various Members of Congress to secure such repeal: Be it further

Resolved, That pending this repeal of the act as a whole Congress be requested and urged to immediately abolish the publicity feature of the law, which is unfair, discriminatory, and unjust: Be it further

Resolved, That a committee of 11 be appointed by the chairman of this conference to devise ways and means with full power to carry out the spirit of these resolutions and test the constitutionality of the law, if deemed advisable.

La Verne W. Noyes, Illinois Manufacturers' Association, chairman, Chicago; A. P. Nevin, National Association Manufacturers, New York; J. H. Beek, St. Paul Jobbers and Manufacturers' Association, St. Paul; W. A. Roberts, Pittsburg Chamber of Commerce, Pittsburg; William O. Matthews, Cleveland Chamber of Commerce, Cleveland; Frederic C. McDuffie, Arkwright Club, Boston; W. B. Martin, Iowa State Manufacturers' Association, Dubuque; T. Jas. Fernley, National Hardware Association, Philadelphia; Melville, W. Mix, Manufacturers' Bureau of Indiana, Mishawaka; W. P. Wagner, Green Bay Business Men's Association, Green Bay, Wis.; Geo. M. Gillette, Minnesota Employers' Association, Minneapolis; L. C. Blanding, Tri-City Manufacturers' Association, Moline, Ill., Committee.

REPEALING MEASURES.

Please demand that corporations be given an immediate hearing on these bills by the Committee on Ways and Means, and refuse to be sidetracked or flagged by any talk looking to delay or by the assertion that nothing can be done.

Sixty-first Congress, second session.

In the House of Representatives, December 14, 1909, Mr. SOUTHWICK introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 14545) to repeal the corporation-tax law.

Be it enacted, etc., That section 38 of the act of August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Sixty-first Congress, second session.

In the House of Representatives, January 10, 1910, Mr. COUDREY introduced the following bill, which was referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. 17504) amending the corporation-tax law.

Be it enacted, etc., That article 3 of the corporation-tax law be amended in such form as to extend the time allowed for filing schedules and returns from the 1st day of March, 1910, to the 1st day of May, 1910, and the 1st day of May in each year thereafter.

SEC. 2. That article 6 of the corporation-tax law is hereby repealed and the following substituted in lieu thereof:

"When the assessment shall be made, as provided in this section, the returns, together with any corrections thereof which may have been made by the commissioner, shall be filed in the office of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue."

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. I did not understand from whom this is.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This is a circular issued by the Illinois Manufacturers' Association and has in it the names of the members of a committee, made up from a number of States, to constitute a national campaign committee. Now, I do not know the amount of this campaign fund that is referred to or what it might be. If every corporation in the country contributed $25, I assume that it would amount to a good many million dollars. The only comment I care to make now is to suggest to gentlemen that it is not at all extraordinary that they are receiving nowadays a large number of letters from corporations in their districts.

I have only one more word to say. I am glad to be able to state that all men interested in corporations and men of large affairs are not of this same mind. I desire to read a letter written by a constituent of mine in reply to this circular. The writer of this letter is one of the largest men of affairs in the city of Cincinnati and a man largely interested in corporations. He says:

JANUARY 27, 1910.

Mr. JOHN M. GLENN,
Secretary Illinois Manufacturers' Association, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: In answer to a circular signed by you on behalf of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, I beg to say, for our company, that we are not in sympathy with the movement of your association, nor do we believe it to be patriotic or wise; therefore we do not contribute. We believe that the support of the administration will be more advantageous to the people of the United States than the point which you make, that Senators and Congressmen should be influenced as a matter of being more under obligations to their constituents than they are to the administration. We are convinced that the business of the United States should pay toward the support of the Government. As to whether this corporation tax is equitable is not the question just now. It is a means which has been adopted, and if it is not equitable it should be modified so as to be an equitable assessment on all business. We do not believe in your campaign.

Very respectfully, yours, LUCIEN WULSIN, President.

I do not intend to discuss the merits of the corporation tax at this time. I shall probably take occasion to do so later. I have risen to-day merely to call the attention of the House and of the country to the methods that some corporations are taking to force a repeal of the corporation tax before it has an opportunity to demonstrate its value, before even its constitutionality has been passed upon by the courts.

The Clerk read as follows:

For investigations of the best methods of road making and the best kinds of road-making materials throughout the United States and for furnishing expert advice on road building and maintenance, $43,000.

Mr. MANN. I reserve the point of order on the paragraph. In view of the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DOUGLAS] to increase the amount, I am inclined to make the point of order, although I am somewhat shaken in that determination because of the fact that the gentleman from Ohio seems to be alone in the proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois make the point of order?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, as I understand, this is one of the few items in the bill where there has been a considerable increase in the appropriation over that made last year.

Mr. SCOTT. The total appropriation for the Office of Public Roads is the same as in the bill of this year.

Mr. MANN. I am not asking for the total appropriation. I am asking for the total on this item.

Mr. SCOTT. The appropriation on this item in the current law is $34,000.

Mr. MANN. And in this bill?

Mr. SCOTT. In this particular item there is an increase of $9,000.

Mr. MANN. As I understand, it is one of the very few items in the bill where there is a substantial increase in the amount appropriated.

Mr. SCOTT. That is very true.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not quite understand the gentleman's remarks. Did I understand him to say that if I did not offer the amendment he would not insist on his point of order?

Mr. MANN. That is the proposition.

Mr. DOUGLAS. All right; then I will not offer it.

Mr. MANN. I will withdraw the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

MISCELLANEOUS.

And the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to investigate the cost of food supplies at the farm and to the consumer, and to disseminate the results of such investigation in whatever manner he may deem best; this authorization to be effective upon the approval of this act.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that paragraph.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to argue the point of order further than to call the attention of the Chair to section 520 of the act creating the Department of Agriculture, which I think the Chairman has on his desk. The committee believe that information relating to the cost of food supplies at the farm and to the consumer would be in the nature of useful information on the subject connected with agriculture, and therefore I can not concede the point of order.

Mr. SHERLEY. I suggest to the Chair that it is very much broader than the authorization, even if that could be construed to authorize a specific provision of this nature. The study of the cost of food supplies is not necessarily limited to the subject of foods that are agricultural products, because there are other food supplies than those produced by agriculture.

Mr. SCOTT. Does not the larger include the lesser?

Mr. SHERLEY. Yes; but the lesser does not include the larger. Agriculture does not create all food supplies.

Mr. COCKS of New York. It says food supplies at the farm.

Mr. SHERLEY. It says cost of food supplies at the farm, but not farm food supplies.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is ready to rule. The paragraph against which a point of order is made proposes that the Secretary of Agriculture shall be authorized to investigate the cost of food supplies at the farm and to the consumer and to disseminate the results of such investigation. It further provides that the authorization shall be effective on the approval of this act.

In the opinion of the Chair, this is clearly legislation. Even if it were an appropriation authorizing this on an appropriation bill, it would still be subject to a point of order as something unauthorized by law. It has been heretofore held that the investigation of foods in their relation to commerce and consumption was not authorized by law in such a way as to permit an appropriation on the agricultural appropriation bill. The Chair therefore sustains the point of order.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, in view of the amendment whereby the paragraph relating to paper tests was transferred to another part of the bill, and in view of the ruling of the Chair by which the paragraph providing for an investigation of the cost of food supplies is removed, I offer an amendment to strike out the last paragraph of the bill, as it is merely a duplication of language already inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the last paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

Total carried by this bill for the Department of Agriculture, $13,417,136.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that that be stricken out.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves that the committee do now rise and report the bill with amendments to the House, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the committee determined to rise; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CAMPBELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 18162, the agricultural appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SCOTT. Mr. Speaker, I demand the previous question on the bill and amendments to its final passage.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the vote will be taken in gross.

There was no demand for a separate vote.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, the Committee on the Public Lands was discharged from consideration of the bill (H. R. 19407) making an appropriation for the repair and maintenance of the east and south roads into the Yellowstone National Park, and the same was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Tuesday, February 15, may be considered as District day in lieu of Monday, February 14.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that Tuesday, February 15, be substituted as District day in lieu of Monday, February 14. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19255, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; and, pending that motion, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the bill be limited to six hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill; and, pending that motion, he asks unanimous consent that debate may close in six hours, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] and the other half by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD]. Is there objection?

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, pending that request I desire to ask the gentleman from New York if he will not consent to make the time for general debate eight hours? I have requests on this side that will take four hours for general debate, and I would like very much to accommodate these gentlemen who have asked for the time.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not want to be unaccommodating to Members on the other side, neither do I want unnecessarily to occupy the time of the House.

The requests that have been made of me, including the few minutes that I shall myself occupy, I do not think will take three hours. I would suggest that we make it seven hours; and I think, without any question, I can help the gentleman out, for I do not think our side will consume as much as three hours' time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, if there is likely to be no expansion of the demand on the gentleman's time, I would suggest that he make it three hours and that he give me four hours of that time.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, that would be unconstitutional. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOWARD. Then, I would like to change the gentleman's constitution.

Mr. PERKINS. No; I should insist on the form that one-half should be controlled by myself and one-half by the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. HOWARD. I would like very much to accommodate the gentlemen on this side of the House who have made a request for time. I do not assume that it is an unnecessary consumption of time. Members of this House who desire time for general debate are presumed, and should be presumed, to make such use of that time as will be commendable to this House, to themselves, and to the country.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Speaker, I trust that the gentleman from New York will accede to the request of the gentleman from Georgia, and for this reason: That it is possible that, as the debate progresses, it may develop requests for time on this side which have not yet been referred to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. PERKINS. Very well, then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to eight hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Georgia and one-half by myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to eight hours, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from New York and one-half by the gentleman from Georgia. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from New York that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 19255, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to occupy but a few minutes in reference to this bill, and as the House is fairly full I think I will do so now. The report of the committee explains fully the items that you are asked to appropriate for in this bill. There is but one large item of increase to which I desire to call the attention of the committee. There is an increase of $250,000 to be paid to the Republic of Colombia. That is in no way an increase in the cost of the diplomatic and consular service, but this year for the first time we begin under this bill to make appropriations at the rate of $250,000 a year, to continue for ten years, which are really a part of the cost of the Panama Canal.

By the treaty in connection with that canal we agreed to pay to the Republic of Panama $250,000 a year, beginning, first, nine years after the making of the treaty, which was modified afterwards so as to begin four years from the time of the making of the treaty. In the meantime it was decided that Panama should pay to Colombia $2,500,000 in ten annual payments for lands belonging to that Republic which, in connection with the construction of the canal and the organization of the new Republic, had been taken. We have agreed that the payments which we should otherwise make directly to Panama should, until the $2,500,000 are paid up, be paid to the Republic of Colombia.

Mr. Chairman, that is the only item of the bill with reference to which I desire to speak particularly, but I do wish to say just one word more. I may be criticised for repeating what I have so often said, what others have so often said, what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] whom I see sitting in front of me has so often said. The only apology I have to make for this bill is not that it is too large, but that it is too small. It would have given me great pleasure and it would have given the committee great pleasure if we had not recognized the fact that our recommendation would have been subject to a point of order, and it was hopeless that there should be no one in this House who would make the point of order, in this bill to have begun, at least, to make some provision that should be the first provision for a system of appropriations for consular buildings in the East and diplomatic buildings in the great capitals of the West.

I do not intend to occupy any of the time of the committee by arguing this question. More and more I think the people of this country and Members of this body recognize that if the diplomatic and consular service is to be maintained at all it should at least be maintained decently. I am glad to say, so far as it may effect gentlemen on the other side of the aisle, I do not think any more clear, cogent, or forceful argument in favor of the installation of a system of purchase of government buildings for the embassies and consuls of the East was ever made before the Committee on Foreign Affairs than was made two or three years ago by that distinguished Democrat, William J. Bryan, and I trust that his words may sink deep into the hearts of his followers. Now, Mr. Chairman, about the only objection advanced to this is the idea originating in the minds of a good many people, perhaps even in the House of Representatives, that the diplomatic service, at least the embassies and the ministries, to some extent are remnants of a former condition, and that the work of the department and the relations with other nations could to a large extent be carried on, as has sometimes been bluntly stated, by cables and telephones, and that the importance of personal relation has grown less. Mr. Chairman, there is no question that for years the work required of an ambassador or minister may not be critical, but the time comes, and it comes just as much now as it came in the days when there were no railroads and no cables and no telephones, when the personal influence of the right man in the right place is worth to the Government infinite money, and no system of communication can take its place. Take now, Mr. Chairman, what is going on in the city of Washington—not so much by our Representatives, perhaps, as by the representatives sent to us—in the negotiations by which it is sought to reach an agreement between this country and the other great countries, under the Payne bill, so that the maximum tariff may not be declared, and so that an agreement may be made by which the President can certify that in his judgment this country is treated by other nations on terms of equality.

The importance of those negotiations, alike to the countries of Europe and to us, no man can overestimate, and any man who knows anything about it must see the absolute necessity of personal interviews by experienced and able men in order to bring about an agreement. Let me suggest one other incident, and only one, because perhaps it is as notable as any in the annals of our country. The cable was working during the civil war. There was a possibility, as every man knows, after the escape of the Alabama and the threatened escape of the other cruisers—and more than a possibility; you might say it was imminent—that a war might arise between this country and England, and if that war had come it surely would have been disastrous and it might have been fatal. There is no man familiar with the history of the country who does not know that the personal influence, the personal contact, the personal appeal, in season and out of season, in public buildings and private houses, of Mr. Adams, our representative at that time, turned the point and saved us from the possibility of war. Those things may come again, Mr. Chairman, and it is surely at this time economy, if we are to preserve this system at all—and preserve it we must—to provide what is necessary for its decent maintenance. And let me make another suggestion to the members of this committee. I am in sympathy with economy as much as any Member of this House, but the manner in which the demand for economy sometimes appears makes me a little tired. When a man talks about economizing and gets very thrifty about his matches, but keeps on drinking his champagne, it does not seem to me that his economy will be largely efficacious. The cost of all the buildings in the East, in China and Japan, that are absolutely requisite for the development of our trade, together with the cost of proper buildings at the embassies—neither so enormous as to require a rich man nor so small as to be unfit for any man—the cost of them all, scattered through a period, say, of ten years, will not exceed, in my judgment, $5,000,000, one-half the cost of a Dreadnought, of which we vote one, two, three, or four, as may be required, every year; and, Mr. Chairman, the $5,000,000 once spent for housing our representatives would remain for a hundred years, when the Dreadnought would have rotted away at the dock in ten years from the time the last nail was driven into it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield, with pleasure.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And also that $5,000,000, if properly spent in the foreign capitals, would not only be worth fully as much at the end of that time as it is now, but infinitely more?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, yes; there is no possible doubt about that. If, for instance, we had bought in the great capitals seats for our representatives at the same time England bought, long ago, for every dollar we paid at that time we could get, assuming that by any possibility we should want to sell, I dare say, $5 now, and the English embassy in Paris could be sold for many times what it cost.

Mr. LONGWORTH. And here at home, in Washington, after investigating this matter pretty thoroughly a few years ago, I found that it cost the English Government less than 40 cents a foot to buy the property upon which the embassy now stands, and it is worth to-day more than $10 a foot on the market.

Mr. MANN. Perhaps we had better buy land all over the world. Will the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] yield for a question?

Mr. PERKINS. I surely will.

Mr. MANN. What does the gentleman estimate it will cost to have an embassy building of our own at Berlin?

Mr. PERKINS. I think a proper building could be bought there for $300,000.

Mr. MANN. I will simply say to the gentleman that I am told by a gentleman who is supposed to be expert on these matters, and who is on the gentleman's committee, that it would cost not less than a million dollars.

Mr. PERKINS. That is simply absurd.

Mr. LONGWORTH. This Government has been offered an option on one of the finest buildings in Berlin for less than $400,000.

Mr. PERKINS. In London, if we bought Dorchester House, it would cost a great deal, but we should buy it. In Paris the Government has been offered a building which may not be ideal, but it seems to me and to the committee that for the purposes of an embassy—not such as some multimillionaire might desire, but so much the better for that—amply sufficient for any proper representation, for between $300,000 and $400,000. When a man comes over and says it will cost a million, either he is some multimillionaire or some real-estate agent.

Mr. MANN. I have been told further—and I wish to ask the gentleman's opinion in reference to it—that the State Department has said it would cost a million dollars in the city of Berlin for an embassy building.

Mr. PERKINS. That is rather extreme, because I have looked over, in the State building, with representatives of the State Department, plans of a building which, perhaps, were not all that could be desired——

Mr. MANN. The plans?

Mr. PERKINS. There is a building there on the ground that could be purchased for between $300,000 and $400,000. I think the gentleman must have seen some excited representative of the State Department.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will pardon me. The talks I have had have been with members of the gentleman's committee.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I can only give the views of one member of the committee. I have seen those plans. I have talked with the State Department, and I have talked with our representatives both at Berlin and Paris. Unless they are all doing a good deal of fibbing the gentleman has been very largely misinformed.

Mr. HENRY W. PALMER. The gentleman has been misled.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman has not been misled. On the contrary, the gentleman helped prepare a bill that is pending before the Committee on Foreign Affairs now, which, if they would report, would finally get something out of this thing.

Mr. PERKINS. That may be; but it will not be necessary under that to pay as much as $1,000,000 for each building.

Mr. MANN. It will not be necessary, but that is the first thing they will ask for when they get the eastern buildings completed—to have a building in Berlin.

Mr. PERKINS. An appropriation for a building that will cost that amount will not come out of the Committee on Foreign Affairs as long as it is constituted as it now is.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I would like, with the consent of the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS], to ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] whether he is opposed to the general proposition of the Government owning embassies in such capitals as Berlin, London, and Paris?

Mr. MANN. I will answer that question very frankly when it is before the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask how many buildings you provide for in this bill?

Mr. PERKINS. None; because we felt confident that the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], or somebody else, would raise a point of order. The proper thing, I think, when any appropriation is to be made, is to make it in a separate bill, and now under our Calendar Wednesday system, fortunately, if you report a bill from the committee you can get it considered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it the plan of the committee to build them all at once——

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri (continuing). Or extend them over a term of years?

Mr. PERKINS. The plan of the committee would be, for instance, if there was an offer of a building in Paris or Berlin at the price of three or four hundred thousand dollars, if that seemed proper and was approved by the judgment of those familiar with the situation, the committee would believe in purchasing a single one in a year, and perhaps making an appropriation for a certain amount for work to be done in the consular buildings in the East, which, of course, presents a different proposition, because in many of those places we have to furnish the building, because there is no building that can be used for consular purposes. There is no necessity for erecting buildings for the consular service in Europe, where suitable buildings can always be had.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is it the intention of the committee or the plan ultimately to build an embassy building wherever we have a diplomatic representative?

Mr. PERKINS. I should think not. We should buy some embassy buildings. I think that in the great capitals, like London, Paris, Berlin, and St. Petersburg, and in Italy, perhaps, the Government should have its building, but no country, so far as I know, has a building in every small nation to which it may send a minister.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, if you are going to build them for the American representatives abroad who are getting the best salaries, is there not much stronger reason why you should build them at the capitals of countries where the ministers are getting smaller salaries?

Mr. PERKINS. The gentlemen who are getting the best salaries are the worst off. A man of moderate means can take a position as minister and go to Belgium or Portugal and live on his salary respectably; there are no great social expenses. But when he goes to London, Paris, or Berlin he will not have much of the $17,500 left after he has paid six or seven thousand dollars a year for rent.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman from Illinois a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Certainly.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman from Illinois commit himself so far as to say whether he will support a bill which would carry no appropriation whatever, but would simply authorize the State Department to acquire at some future time land or buildings for this purpose whenever Congress should appropriate therefor?

Mr. MANN. Is the gentleman acquainted with the Lowden bill, pending in the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am very familiar with it.

Mr. MANN. Is the chairman of the committee familiar with that bill?

Mr. PERKINS. I am quite familiar with it.

Mr. MANN. I should say that a bill like the Lowden bill, if presented in the House, not for a million dollars, but half a million dollars a year, might pass through Congress without opposition at all, and that would cover the first year, taking care of the consular buildings in the Far East, the estimate for which a year ago was $575,000, or something like that.

Mr. PERKINS. Including the building at Shanghai, something more than that should be provided.

Mr. MANN. Possibly. The Lowden bill seems to be very well safeguarded in that direction. It seems to me that a million dollars at the present time is a little too large an amount, but half a million dollars would probably cover all that is necessary. I do not think gentlemen would find any objection to passing a bill of that kind.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am glad to have the gentleman say that.

Mr. MANN. I think that would accomplish all that is necessary at this time. I would be glad to see the bill pass without any opposition. The Lowden bill carries no appropriation.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it does.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is mistaken. The Lowden bill provides for the authorization.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The Lowden bill last year did.

Mr. PERKINS. But not this.

Mr. MANN. The Lowden bill carries an authorization which is well safeguarded, so as to make some provision against extravagant expenditures if some one in the State Department should desire to indulge in making extravagant expenditures, holding the matter in the control of Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. If the gentleman is through, I desire to say one word more, and call the attention of the House to one thing, and I would be glad if through the newspapers some of those outside the House might have their attention called to it, and that is the cost of our consular service. When we are in here asking with all modesty, and there has been considerable delay certainly in receiving an answer, for proper consular housing in the East and diplomatic housing in the West, I would like to state to the House the net cost of the consular service.

We have consuls in every civilized and pretty nearly every uncivilized land. Whatever the consular service may have been in the past—it never was as black as it was painted—it undoubtedly has been vastly improved in the last few years, and it does most valuable work. The import business from the rest of the world, amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars a year, is dependent upon the consular service for the proper certificates and documents in order that the goods may be sent from all parts of the world to this country. Everyone will agree with me that the consular service has done work of enormous value in increasing the exports of this country. It has opened new channels of trade. It has sent its reports, some of which have certainly been of very large value, calling the attention of the manufacturers of this country and the producers of this country to new fields for American enterprise, thereby giving our exports a proper outlet as American manufactures become more and more important.

Such is the work done by this service. What do the Members of this House suppose it costs for all this work done over the entire world? Under a bill that we passed a few years ago absolutely all fees are turned into the Treasury. Everybody, high or low, consular clerk or consul-general, is paid a fixed salary from the Government, and receives no more and no less. During the past year the entire expense of the consular service, consuls' assistants, clerks, and all those connected with it, was a little over $2,000,000. There was received in cash by the Government from fees collected by these consuls $1,800,000 in round figures. In other words, the net cost of the consular service during the year last past was $249,000. That is less than we spend every year to check the onward progress of the gypsy moth; and if there is any other branch of the Government that for the expenditure of $249,000 can show work like that done by the consular service, covering hundreds of millions of dollars of commerce between this country and other countries, I am not familiar with it. Surely, Mr. Chairman, with such results, the consular service of the United States deserves our commendation, our support, and our pride. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour, or so much of it as he may require, to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT].

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the matter which I propose to discuss is the question of federal incorporation. I presume I shall use the entire hour, which is about fifteen minutes more time than I have ever before taken to make a speech in the House, but I do not see how I can occupy any less time. Is it the desire of the committee to remain in session for another hour this afternoon?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19255, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

CLEARANCES AND SAILINGS FROM UNITED STATES PORTS.

Mr. GREENE. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, I ask unanimous consent to print as a House document, for the use of the Members of the House, a statement showing clearances and sailings from United States ports during the six months ending December 31, 1909, of mail and commercial steamers. (H. Doc. No. 641.)

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no argument in favor of a ship subsidy in it, is there?

Mr. GREENE. Not at all. It is simply what its title indicates.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 19783) amending section 38 of the act of August 5, 1909, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes."

NATIONAL RESOURCES.

Mr. JONES. I present a short communication, addressed to me by Arthur J. Shaw, of Spokane, Wash., relative to the national resources on the public lands of the United States. I ask that the communication be printed in the RECORD, without reading, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection, the communication was referred to the Committee on Public Lands and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SPOKANE, WASH., January 18, 1910.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I trust that you will not think it impertinent on my part to express my views to you concerning the national resources on the public lands of the United States. As you know, I have for many years been employed in the government land service, and have been a resident of Idaho and Washington for twenty-seven years.

Before the Federal Constitution was adopted by the legislatures of the 13 original colonies all the lands and water thereon and natural resources—such as timber, coal, minerals, and water power—were declared to be the property of the people of the respective colonies. After the adoption of the Constitution all the lands within these colo- states and the lands constituting the States of Kentucky and Tennessee were owned, controlled, and sold by these respective States. All the remaining outlying lands constituted the public lands of the United States.

From the 20th day of May, 1785, to June 30, 1909, under the various acts of Congress, there was received from the sale of the public lands and converted into the general fund of the Treasury of the United States $423,135,507.90. Nearly every settler who has contributed his earnings to this amount has had to borrow his proportion of this money and pay interest thereon. It is not an unreasonable estimate to make when it is stated that the public-land owners of the South and West have been obliged to earn and pay $1,000,000,000 to secure title to their homes. The new States now constitute more than two-thirds of the United States of America. Is there any valid reason why these new States should be required to pay nearly half of a billion dollars into the general fund of the Public Treasury when the original States were not required to pay a single dollar? If this can only be answered in the negative, why should the public-land States continue to pay annually $9,000,000 from the sale of lands into the Treasury?

Not only the lands of the original States, but all of their "natural resources," were and are owned and utilized locally, and, under the Federal Constitution, it is not within the power of this Government to control them, except by purchase. Under the circumstances there is nothing to prevent the predatory dollar, the trusts, the syndicate, the Morgans, or the Rockefellers from absorbing everything in this unfortunately unprotected portion of the United States.

When the public surveys—no public surveys were ever made in the original States—were to be extended over government lands, it was provided by statute that the lines of survey should not be extended over navigable or tide waters of the United States. The banks and beds of streams, together with the waters therein, were reserved from sale, and when the new States were admitted to the Union these banks and beds of streams and all the waters within those States were declared to be the property of the respective States. State control and state ownership has always been exercised over this class of property, subject to the right of Congress to regulate commerce. Under these circumstances it may be a matter of doubt as to whether the Federal Government has a right to charge for the use of water within a State. The various States have, through their legislatures, declared title to all waters within the States and have provided statutory ways and means by which title can be acquired for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes.

In 1877 (see discussion in CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 44th Cong., vol. 5, pt. 2, pp. 1966 to 1968) Congress passed an act which provided that "the water of all lakes, rivers, and other sources of water supply upon the public lands and not navigable shall remain and be held free for the appropriation and use of the public for irrigation, mining, and manufacturing purposes, subject to existing rights." Thus the nonnavigable waters in Territories and navigable and nonnavigable waters in States are held free for a useful purpose, subject to existing rights. In order to give force to this statute existing rights must clearly mean existing appropriations of water for a useful purpose. The statutory authority to hold the water "free for public appropriation" must necessarily abrogate the old common-law riparian ownership on all government lands and on all lands purchased from the Government since the passage of this act. This statute is the only safeguard for the Reclamation Service in the West. But for it the riparian owners along the streams and lakes wherein water is diverted for irrigation and other purposes could maintain innumerable suits for damages, and thus hamper and possibly prevent the diversion of water for the useful purposes named in this statute. This statute was enacted for the benefit of the people, and it should never be repealed.

If Congress should change the rule of property rights in water and charge a nominal fee per horsepower, as has been suggested, what would be the result? The longest electrical-power line in the world is less than 200 miles in length. If a train upon a track electrically equipped should be started with hydro-electrical power, furnished from the greatest power-producing plant in the world, it would become stalled for want of power within a radius of 200 miles from its starting point. Thus the patrons within this small radius of territory would be obliged to pay the federal tax per horsepower for water used for power and lighting purposes. Is there any equitable reason why the people of the South and West should pay a consumers' tax on water power that is not paid by the consumer living in the first States constituting this Union?

Within the Pacific coast States in the near future will be built an empire equal to the Atlantic coast empire. To encourage its upbuilding it should have all the natural power and fuel at its command at a minimum cost. Instead of saying to the investing dollar, you shall not develop these national resources without paying a bounty, concessions should be made in aid of their development. In the sparsely settled sections of the West and South it is very difficult to interest capital in the development of hydro-electrical power, for the reason that a million dollars or more is required to construct and install a power plant. If a government tax is added the investing dollar will naturally be located in one of the original States, which will, to that extent at least, retard the manufacturing industries of the South and West.

It is also suggested that a tax be paid on every ton of coal that is mined from the public domain. Coal is valuable for the units of heat it will produce. When its cost of production and its cost of transportation equals its value in units of heat the extent of the area in which it can be marketed is determined. If a tax is added, which will increase the cost, the area will be lessened to that extent, and the consumers within that area must pay the added tax.

Nearly all the producing coal mines in this country are owned and operated by railway companies. If a royalty is levied upon coal mined upon government land, it will permit the railway companies, as competitors, to charge the consumer so much more for coal and thus place millions of money in the pockets of the coal barons at the expense of the consumer. Coal is usually sold at the mine at a very small profit per ton. The large mines of Ohio and West Virginia are leased upon a royalty of 10 cents per ton. Under like conditions in the west a nominal government royalty, necessarily small, would constitute a large portion of the profit.

It costs about $200,000 to develop and equip a coal mine, and it is doubtful if any company could be found willing to undertake the task of mining coal on leased lands in competition with the old companies, with a government bounty as a handicap.

The various kinds of coal found in the Territory of Alaska have never been marketed, because of the excessive cost of development and the lack of transportation, and it is very doubtful if this so-called and misnamed "great Alaskan wealth" will ever materialize without government aid.

The steam locomotive is the great consumer of the world's supply of coal. A 250-ton locomotive will pull 60 carloads of freight from New York to the foothills of the Rocky Mountains. When this point is reached double-header locomotives are used for a distance; then the train is cut in two and two double-headers are supplied. Just before the last steep climb is made to the mountain tunnels, which are nearly a mile above the level of the sea, a large locomotive is added to push each train through the tunnels. Thus six times as many units of heat are consumed in transporting freight over the mountain ranges of the West as is required on level territory.

Coming down the sides of these mountains, from snow-capped peaks, are thousands upon thousands of tons of water capable, if harnessed into electrical power, to carry a much greater tonnage over the great western divides without consuming the local coal reserves. Instead of levying a tribute for this power, and thus raising the freight rates proportionately for the consumers of the West, it would seem to be a wise precaution in the exercise of economy in our political housekeeping to encourage, and, if necessary, compel the great railway companies to use hydro-electrical power wherever possible and thus conserve for public use the coal reserves of this country. Such a policy would naturally reduce the consumption of coal and lessen its cost to the consumer.

A large portion of the timber reserves of this country have passed beyond federal control. When the States of Washington, Idaho, and Utah were admitted to the Union their estimated wealth in timber was a very attractive feature. Settlers came from all parts of the United States, knowing how valuable an asset timber lands would soon become, made filings, and prosecuted their claims to patent in the shortest time possible. Large tracts were combined and sold to sawmilling companies. Some of these companies attempted to enlarge their holdings by securing dummy entrymen to make final proof upon lands adjacent to their mills. When Judge Ballinger was appointed Commissioner of the General Land Office special agents were appointed by him to inspect all entered lands and ascertain the good faith and compliance with the statutes of the entryman before final proof was made. This wise precaution is in practice to this day, and it is now virtually impossible for an applicant to obtain title to land through fraud.

When the forest reserves were extended over the great land grants of the continental roads of the West, the railroad companies owning these granted lands at once applied for and received land scrip in lieu of the lands thus taken into the forest reserves. That the reader may fully understand where valuable timber is found on mountains it will only be necessary to state that the action of the rains and melting snows washes the rich soil to the foothills and valleys, where the heavy growth of timber is found at a comparatively low altitude. Upon ascending the mountain the trees diminish in size until the timber line is reached, where the climate is so cold that nothing will grow.

From this it will be seen that these railway companies had many thousands of acres within their land grant, extending across the mountains, that were absolutely worthless. To place or extend a forest reserve over these granted lands could only result in a gift of millions of dollars in scrip to the railway companies. This scrip was at once sold to large mill companies, who located all the valuable timber lands along the foothills and valleys of the mountains accessible to transportation in the States above named. When these States were admitted to the Union, Congress very properly, in view of the fact that the 13 original States owned and utilized all their land, donated to each of these new States 200,000 acres of land for school and capitol building purposes. The governors of these States have not to this day been able to locate the whole amount of these donated lands, for the reason that scrip locations have been made in advance of the government surveys. In the meantime, the prospective settler is crowded back upon the mountain sides within the forest reserve, where little of value is found. Could it be possible for the people of these respective States to have squandered their greatest wealth if they had originally owned these lands? Does conservation conserve?

If there is anything of value left, would it not be wise to let the people of the land-grant States, who understand local conditions and values, own and control their own natural resources without the burden of additional taxation? It is only through their work and enterprise that these resources have been made valuable, and why should the people of other States share in the fruits of their labor?

There is not a single owner having large holdings in sheep or cattle who has been able to obtain a favorable lease to the exclusion of the local settler at a nominal figure on the forest reserves, for a stock range, who does not favor the present plan of the conservation of natural resources. There is not a single owner of timbered lands who expects to purchase the small amount of timber now remaining on the forest reserves at a nominal figure who does not favor the reforestation plan proposed by the Government. It is natural that this should be the case. But how about the interests of the people who have made these natural resources valuable? They would like to share some of the beneficial results of their labor and self-sacrifice.

If hydro-electrical power is to be the substitute for the power now generated from the vanishing supply of coal and wood, then it will soon be necessary to construct power plants on nearly all of the navigable rivers throughout the United States. Applications may soon be made to Congress for authority to construct perhaps 20 or more (or as many as the natural fall of the river will permit) generating stations on the Hudson River to furnish light, power, and heat for the people of New York City and the surrounding country. Will the people of this metropolitan city vote to pay an additional federal tax every time they press the button? The voters of this country might be induced once to cast their ballots for the proposed plan for the conservation of natural resources, but when they understand that by so doing they must pay the additional tax, no Member of Congress could expect to be elected on that issue a second time.

Mr. Lincoln once said that "You can fool all the people some of the time and a part of the people all the time, but you can't fool all the people all the time."

Yours, very respectfully, ARTHUR J. SHAW.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed, and the calendar is in order.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BAILEY. What is the request? My attention was diverted.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. That the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the postal savings-depositories bill.

Mr. BAILEY. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President. Would the granting of the request make the bill the unfinished business——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It would not.

Mr. BAILEY. And displace the present unfinished business?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It would not.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I have no objection to the request.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I yield to the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER].

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask that the bill be temporarily laid aside.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside. The Chair hears no objection.

PRICES OF FARM PRODUCTS.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I have listened with great interest and with still greater concern to the discussion, not only in the press but in the Senate, on what are called exhorbitant prices of food products. I have been doubly concerned, because I have long since learned that the interest of the food producer is the last one to be considered whenever any conflict arises in the industrial or commercial field between his interest and that of the rest of the population. Following this natural trend of the political mind, the moment agitation was started against the high price of food products a blow was struck at the farmer—the producer. Two bills were introduced in Congress the other day, one to deprive the farmer of any protection to his meat products and the other to deprive him of any protection on any other thing which his toil produces. The conditions seemed to demand that something or some one should be assaulted. The farmers of the country have not that thorough organization which enables them to strike back quickly and effectively, and so it was thought much safer to strike in that direction.

It is rather singular, if not amusing, to note that without stopping to investigate any of the causes for these so-called "exorbitant" prices of food products, without taking any steps to ascertain whether the farmer is receiving more than fair compensation for his labors, or whether the meat trust or retail trust is responsible for these high prices of food products, we start an industrial and a legislative boycott against the tillers of the soil.

Mr. President, I say now, most earnestly and emphatically, that never in the history of the country have the farmers received the honest, inherent value of their products, based upon the labor bestowed upon them; that the labor of the farmer has always been the poorest paid labor in the United States; that the thing which the farmer sells always has represented and still represents twice as much expended energy in its production as the thing which he buys with it; that, based upon the amount and the character of labor required, the food products have been and are to-day cheaper than any other products in this country. The food producer has for ages been suffering this commercial wrong. It is useless to go into the question of the origin of the injustice or how a system has grown into existence whereby agriculture has been forced to occupy a position in the industrial field inferior to that of any other vocation. We know that any two articles, each requiring the same amount of intelligence and labor in its production, ought to trade equally, one for the other, and that if a system has grown up whereby two of such articles are compelled to be traded for one of the other, there is an industrial wrong that ought to be righted; and while we may not be able to remedy it by legislation, we certainly ought not to attempt by legislation to prevent the law of home supply and demand from working out its own remedy.

We are now approaching a condition when the farmer is about to secure equality of remuneration, and the moment we reach toward that goal of justice a boycott is started against his products, both in the cities and in the National Legislature, by the introduction of bills designed to destroy his profits.

The world has been so used to that inequitable condition and has so accustomed itself to it that it views with alarm any evidence of the breaking of the crust of that venerable custom whereby, with far less endeavor and with fewer hours of labor, all other trades and professions have lived—many in luxury and all in comfort—upon the surplus created by the tillers of the soil by their longer hours of service and fewer days of recreation.

It has been customary to look upon the agriculturist as a sort of laborer designed by the Almighty to furnish food for the rest of humanity, for which necessary function he has been conceded the right to live in a humble and unostentatious manner, and the fact that he seems to be rising from this condition is looked upon by the balance of the world as the height of audacity that ought to be summarily checked.

Mr. President, I represent an agricultural citizenship in this Congress, and I purpose to defend their interests all along the line. I believe their labor is just as intelligent as the highest priced labor in the United States, and that they should receive for that labor, in its product, just as much as other skilled laborers receive for their service, and anyone who imagines that he is going to secure any legislation that shall leave the agricultural products of this country unprotected while other interests are protected may prepare for a long, determined, and vigorous battle.

For the last few months the farmer has been securing better remuneration for his labor in the higher prices paid for his products than he has received since the war. He is, however, receiving not one cent more for any article than he is justly entitled to, and in my candid opinion he is not receiving as much to-day as he is going to receive in the future, and in the very near future. And the public may just as well begin to understand that the day of equal justice to the farmers of this country, though long delayed, is near at hand. Heretofore the products of his labor and the labor of his family have had to compete in open market with articles produced by the cheaper labor of the world. The day of overproduction of food products has nearly passed. Consumption is rapidly overtaking production, and we are reaching a trade condition when the farmer's work, hour for hour, will be worth just as much as that of the artisan, the bricklayer, or the carpenter in your great cities.

The value of the product of your mills and your factories is governed by the amount of capital invested, the cost of the raw material, and the price paid for the labor which creates it. If the amount of capital required to-day to economically produce any line of manufactured article is twice as much as it was fifteen or twenty years ago, and if the labor employed is twice as expensive as it was then, your manufactured article will advance in price accordingly, and the farmer will pay that advanced price. And yet we seem to be struck with a fit of consternation if the same governing principles are applied to the farmer's produce.

Wheat lands in the Red River Valley which ten years ago could be purchased for from $10 to $25 per acre are to-day worth $40 and $50 per acre. The day labor which ten years ago could be secured at from $1.50 to $1.75 per day now ranges from $2.50 to $3 per day. We are compelled to double the amount of money invested as capital in a farm; we are compelled to double the prices paid for the farm labor. Can anyone, therefore, give me any honest reason why the product of that farm should not greatly increase in value, in order that the farmer may pay for his farm from its proceeds? If wheat was worth 60 cents a bushel when land was worth $20 an acre and labor $1.50 per day, why should it not be worth at least $1 when both the land and the labor have doubled?

And when, Mr. President, because of increased prosperity over the whole country, the farmer pays more for the things he buys, why should he not receive more for the things he sells? Ten years ago, throughout the western part of my State, land could be purchased from $3 to $5 per acre for grazing purposes. That same land is to-day worth at least $20 per acre. It is so high priced that you can not afford to use it for ordinary range or pasture purposes. You are therefore compelled to cultivate this high-priced land and raise crops on it to feed your cattle. You can not raise cattle as cheaply as you could a few years ago when you could get land cheaper. And if the cost of raising a steer has greatly increased, why should not the price which the farmer receives for that steer increase accordingly? If the earning capacity of the people of the United States has advanced 60 per cent in the last dozen or fifteen years, why should not the farmer be entitled to the same raise?

You are complaining about prices paid for beef. Do you ever stop to think what it costs to produce that beef—of the years of labor bestowed upon it?

It takes about four years to produce a steer in the best condition for beef purposes. Before the farmer could own that steer he must expend from one-half to two-thirds of his working life in earning the farm on which the steer is to be raised. He must then cultivate that land; he must raise crops of hay and corn and other produce to feed that steer. He must then for four long years dance atendance upon the wants and the requirements of that animal. He must feed him and shelter him and take care of him, with a three-tine fork at one end and a four-tine fork at the other end. At the expiration of that time he ships him to Chicago, pays the freight and feed and stockyard charges and turns him over to the beef trust.

That represents the amount of labor expended upon that steer by the farmer. What then becomes of him? Mr. President, within thirty minutes after he goes into the hands of the beef trust he is beef and in cold storage, and ready for shipment to the city of Washington or to other places.

Now, what are the comparative prices that are received by the farmer and that are received here? I have before me a bill of fare taken from the United States Senate cafe down here. I look at that bill of fare and I observe the prices of steaks. I notice that the ordinary sirloin steak will run from $1.15 up to $3 per service. I notice that the tenderloin will run about the same; and I find that the porterhouse will run from $2 up to about $4 in the ordinary restaurant.

I had a meat man a short time ago give me an estimate of what a 4-year-old steer would bring if served at one of the restaurants here in the city of Washington at these rates, taking all the items that you will find in this list, and he estimated that it would bring from $2,000 to $3,000. The farmer's price is about $60 to $80, with all of the four years that he expended upon that steer. With the little additional work, thirty minutes in the city of Chicago and transporting him here to the city of Washington and cooking him at your café, he advances from $70 to $2,500 or $3,000—enough to pay half the price of a farm. Yet the people who are paying those prices for this same steer served are introducing bills in Congress and asking that the tariff or protection be taken away from the farmer's product on which he has expended all these years of labor.

Now, let me speak of this matter as it applies to other products and I will show that the farmer's produce immediately advances with a very little additional labor upon it from 200 per cent to 6,000 per cent before it reaches the table of the family or in the restaurant.

Let us take wheat, Mr. President, which probably represents the least margin of difference between what the farmer receives and what is received for it at the bakery or at the restaurant. The farmer in my State received about 90 cents a bushel for his last year's crop of wheat. One bushel of wheat will make about 75 loaves of bread. The loaf is ordinarily about 14 ounces in weight, and it contains considerable moisture in making up its weight.

Before the farmer became the owner of that bushel of wheat he had to spend two-thirds of his working life in order to become the owner of the farm on which it was raised. Then he had to plow that land; he had to cultivate it; the next spring he had to seed it; he had to furnish seed. He then had to harvest the crop, cut it and bind it, and thrash it, and pay the expenses, and then haul it to the elevator.

That represents his work upon it. Now, I want any man to compare the amount of energy expended in producing a bushel of wheat on the farm with the amount of energy expended in transporting that wheat to the city of Minneapolis or to Chicago, grinding it into flour, transporting it to the bakery, and converting it into bread. I think you will find that there has been at least double the amount of energy expended in producing it than was expended upon it after it left the farmer's hands. And yet, taking the average price that the baker receives, say 5 cents a loaf, you will find that that bushel has advanced from 90 cents to $3.75 a bushel, or an increase of 400 per cent.

But, Mr. President, I want to follow that bushel of wheat a step further, to meet the objections of the people who claim that they are paying too high prices for food products and blame the protection to the farmer for that condition. Let us follow it to the restaurant. When that is served down here in your restaurant or in any other restaurant in the city of Washington, if you order bread and butter alone, you are paying all the way from 10 cents to 20 cents a service. You will probably use about a couple of slices. That same loaf of bread, then, sells upon the table in the restaurant for about 50 cents, and 75 loaves, at 50 cents apiece, means $37.50 for that bushel of wheat. Then we have, again, the farmer's price, 90 cents a bushel. The price after the farmer has let go of it and it reaches the consumer on the table is $37.50 per bushel.

I can take anything else that the farmer produces and show the same advance in the price after it leaves his hands; I do not care whether it is fruit or cereals, or whatever it may be.

Let us take potatoes. I saw a farmer the other day, and he told me he was receiving 30 or 35 cents a bushel for his potatoes. I find from this same bill of fare that if you will take one of those potatoes and hash it brown down here you pay 15 cents for it. In other words, 2 potatoes served here cost as much as the entire bushel of about 300 potatoes that was sold by the farmer, an increase of about 3,000 per cent, and this leaves out of account entirely the other half bushel that has to be turned over to the colored waiter for serving that one potato.

I could select, Mr. President, a great many other articles and they will all show the same additional price. I am speaking of those things simply to show that there is no ground on earth for the objections that are being directed against the farmers' product or against the protection which he receives upon it.

Suppose the farmer does get the full benefit of his present tariff protection, and that if you should remove that tariff he would only receive $60 instead of $80 for the four years of labor bestowed upon a steer, and suppose you should really get some benefit out of his loss and get your beef half a cent cheaper, are you in a position to ask it? Is the average family in the city of Washington, for instance, entitled to object to the profits that are being made by the farmer in the production of beef for its tables? You will probably find the father of this family in government service earning from $1,400 to $2,000 a year, with probably a couple of daughters earning from $1,000 to $1,400 per year, and possibly a son or two with equal earning capacity. Is there any family on the farm whose net income will measure up to the income of that family? And if, as is the case, the great majority of the clerks are unmarried, then you have from $1,000 to $2,000 salary for one individual. Is there any young man or young woman on the farm who is receiving such compensation? Does the average family on the farm, the husband, the wife, or the daughter earn any such sums, even with the present prices of food products?

Mr. President, you know they do not, and I know they do not. The average housewife on the farm does not receive as much compensation as the colored cook in your families, and she does not have her Wednesdays and Sundays off, either, by any means.

What does the bricklayer, the carpenter, the stonecutter receive in the large cities per hour? Probably not less than 40 cents, and from that up to 60 cents an hour. Now, you estimate the farmer's labor at 40 cents an hour in raising that steer, and what will its value be? I do not mean for the whole four years, but for the actual time bestowed upon it. The value of that steer will be at least several times as much as the farmer is receiving to-day. What right then have you to ask him to reduce his price? Will the bricklayer, the carpenter, or the stonecutter enter into an agreement with the farmer to build a house for the latter at the same compensation per hour that the farmer receives in producing a steer for beef? Not by any means. If he will, the whole country will soon be a garden, dotted with beautiful farm homes.

If they will not, what right have they to complain against the farmer? If they will direct their complaints against the beef trust or the retail trust, they may have ample reason for it, but they have no reason on earth to complain against the farmer or the farmer's prices.

I have stated that the country will have to get used to paying higher prices for food products, just as the farmer for years has been compelled to adjust his expenditures according to the prices he has been compelled to pay for the things which he requires for his use. And it will be no hardship. The adjustment may force greater economy. It may compel a denial of a few luxuries; and why should it not? By what law, God given or man created, have the denizens of the cities a greater right to the comforts, the luxuries, the pleasures of life than have the tillers of the soil?

How many farmers bring their families into the cities and pay $2 a seat at your theaters? How many times a year do they indulge in that luxury? Not once. A half-dollar seat would seem to them to border on the realm of extravagance. Yet the whole white population of this city turns out en masse to fill those theaters at those prices year in and year out. And even the poor government clerk drops her $4 for a seat at the grand op ra as though it were one of the ordinary necessities of life. I am glad their compensation enables them to do so. But, I insist, they have no just complaint against the farmer, who does not earn enough to ever justify any such expensive habits.

The wonderful prosperity of the last dozen years has developed a life of reckless extravagance in this country. The great number of wealthy people now present in every large city has set a pace of high living with which the less fortunate are trying to keep up. Economy and self-denial seem to have become almost a lost art. The city gait is entirely out of relation and proportion to the more rigid economy practiced by the rural population. There must and should be an economic adjustment upon a plane of closer equality, and this means that we must eliminate some of our most extravagant habits; that we may not satisfy all of our expensive desires. We make living expensive because we submit to excessive charges rather than deny ourselves some useless luxury. Let us begin our economy at the right point. Let those men who need some expression for their excessive boycott spirit turn it against the $5 to $25 per day rooms at their hotels. Let those ladies direct it toward the $25 to $50 hat that has not $4 actual worth of material on it. When they have done that they will have accomplished a double good—they will have brought these and kindred articles down to a reasonable basis, and they will have saved sufficient means to pay the farmer and the retailer fair and honest compensation for their foodstuffs. They will have given new strength and power to the principle of "live and let live."

Mr. President, I am not imbued with one atom of socialism. There is not one drop of that creed in my mental make-up. But I have a sense of equal justice, and that sense of justice is outraged when I read of the men and women who have accumulated vast fortunes in this country out of a prosperity whose foundation is agriculture—for, after all, agriculture is the foundation of all our wealth—meeting in their palaces to boycott the farmer's product, to boycott the man whose back has bended low in toil to support, with the greatest frugality, and care for and educate his family—just as dear to him as are those of the boycotters organizing against the farmer to destroy his meager profits.

Mr. President, I prophesied in a public address two weeks ago that unless the farmers of this country immediately began an organization to protect their own interests, as soon as they began to receive just and fair prices an agitation would be started to place them back in their old condition, and that as soon as we reached that stage where the consumption of food products in this country would equal production and the farmer began to secure his just rights, bills would be introduced to take away his protection. It seems I did not have to wait ten years. I had to wait less than two weeks before such bills were introduced in Congress.

To offset the effect of this agitation against the food products of this country, I introduced a resolution the other day asking the Committee on Agriculture to investigate the question of cost of production of an article on the farm, the price received for it on the farm, and the price received for the same article after it had left the farmer's hands and reached the consumer, either at the retail store or on the table at the restaurants. My object in introducing this resolution was that it might act as a kind of a buffer against this contemplated legislation. I knew that any honest investigation of the subject would show, first, that considering the rise in the value of lands, the price of labor, the price of the things which the farmer must buy with his products, the farmer is not yet receiving his just dues; second, that with less labor expended on an article after it leaves the farmer's hands than was expended on it before, its price increases from 200 to 6,000 per cent before it reaches the table for consumption. I felt certain that as soon as the public became aware of this truth there would be no further demand to deprive the farmer of any advantage that might accrue to him by reason of the present protective rates.

But let us get at the real causes for the higher prices of our food products. I want to give here in a very few sentences the combined causes, for no single cause is responsible for them.

There are four prime causes. The first is the enormous increase in our circulating medium, and that affects not only farm produce, but it affects everything else, and is responsible in a great degree for these higher prices. The per capita circulation of the United States in 1900 was about $25. It is to-day, I believe, about $38, an increase of over 60 per cent. Now, everyone understands that the value of a commodity always responds to the quantity of the circulating medium. Money is not only the measure of value of an article, but it is a commodity having an inherent value, which increases and decreases as its volume expands or contracts. If you have added 60 per cent to your measuring stick, how can anyone reasonably ask that the thing measured by it should be according to the old standard and not the new length? If money has increased in per capita volume 60 per cent, it is nothing more than reasonable that there should be a similar raise in the price of the article purchased with that money. It excites little comment when this rule is applied to other things. But it seems to excite wide and wild condemnation when applied to the farmers' products.

The second cause is that of the scarcity of the article, the result of the law of supply and demand. On account of the higher price of land, the higher price of corn and every product that goes into making cattle and hogs, the number raised has not kept pace with increasing population. The price of cattle in Chicago depends to some extent, at least, upon the question of supply and demand. Whenever shipments come in a little too heavily prices go down by the act of the beef trust. Whenever they can not get sufficient they bid up to start the stock moving again. They have been bidding up lately and have been compelled to go higher and higher, because there has not been the quantity in the country to fill the demand. They had to raise the price of hogs to 9 cents on the foot, and still they could not get enough. And of course if they have to pay higher prices we must naturally look for corresponding raises in the price of the meat product. But we should not look for more than what would be a corresponding raise.

The third cause is that of the trustification of our meat industry. The economy in handling and converting the live stock into meat products at these great centers is so much greater than in the small establishments that the latter have not been able to compete with them in producing many kinds of meat. And more and more, therefore, has the industry gone into the hands of a few persons who, working in unison, fix the prices in the several sections and cities of the country. And those prices are not fixed so much by the law of supply and demand as they are by the ability of the people of any section to pay a given price.

And this leads directly to the fourth cause; that is, ability to pay. Prices are fixed in every city to correspond with the earning capacity of the people of that city. Prices are higher in Washington than in Baltimore. Why? Because the earnings of the people per capita in Washington are much above those in Baltimore. And this applies to nearly every article of commerce. Let me give a little illustration: A hog is raised in North Dakota and is shipped to Chicago, eight hundred or a thousand miles. It is converted into meat. One ham is shipped back to North Dakota and sold there. The other ham of the same animal is shipped to Washington and sold here. Now, the freight rates are probably less between Chicago and Washington than between Chicago and a given point in North Dakota. They certainly should be no more. But if you will go into the markets you will find that you will buy the one ham for at least 25 per cent less in North Dakota than you will pay for the other ham in Washington. Again, why? Because the ordinary clerk in North Dakota does not receive from $1,000 to $1,400 a year, as he or she does here if fortunate enough to get into department service. The amount paid in private business is probably a little more than half what is paid in the departments. The earning capacity, therefore, of this class of wage-earners is nearly double in the city of Washington what it is elsewhere. The ability of the public at any point to pay a given rate for any commodity and still live has been carefully gauged by these trusts, wholesale and retail, and prices have been fixed accordingly.

And this condition explains a matter that was brought up here the other day—the difference in the cost of meat in Detroit and in Windsor, on the Canadian side. The people of Detroit earn more, live better, and are able to pay a higher price for their meat than the people of Windsor are able to pay. Under the system which has grown up wherever the packers and retailers have practically no competition, the price in any given city is gauged according to what the people can stand.

The farmer, however, must not lose sight of some of the benefits to him which flow from the more remunerative employment outside of the farm. Two-thirds of the population is engaged in business outside of agriculture. It is far better for the farmer that one man produces the food for two than that two men should produce the food for one.

But I want to give a little note of warning to those people who believe in a policy of protection, but want to deny it to any particular class of the American people. I have always admitted that so long as we are exporting, so long as production in this country is very much in excess of consumption, we could get only partial benefits from a protection of our cereals and food products—that is, a partial direct benefit. We did get great indirect benefits by the building up and adding to the volume of consumption in this country. But, as was explained by the Senator from Texas the other day, even while we are exporting in considerable amounts, we still get protection within certain zones, governed more or less by freight rates, and so forth. We get higher prices for our grain in North Dakota than are received on the Canadian side; and I have no doubt but that if we would allow the free importation of cattle, hogs, sheep, and other meat-producing animals it would, by increasing the supply of the live stock in the country, decrease the pirce of that stock to some extent, but not very much to the consumer. In other words, the farmers might suffer by it, but consumers gain very little. Certainly anyone can easily understand that a cent and a half per pound tariff does not explain a 5 or 10 cents per pound excess of prices.

Mr. President, we have been entertained in the press and in both Houses of Congress with a great deal of philosophy concerning the drift of population from the farm to the city, and we are pleading with the young man to remain upon the farm, overlooking the fact that the law of supply and demand governs just as much in the matter of the flow of population toward any vocation as it does in any line of business. Population will go where it will find greatest profit. The young man has been leaving the farm because, with the expenditure of a given amount of energy, he can earn more, live better, and get more enjoyment out of life in the city than he can on the farm. There is no business or profession in the country that has not heretofore opened into an avenue of far greater possibilities than agriculture.

Why, Mr. President, men have become millionaires by manufacturing toothpicks; men have become millionaires by making chewing gum; men have become millionaires by mixing up a few harmless herbs with a little poor whisky and palming it off on the public as a cure-all. This world is full of men who have become millionaires and multimillionaires by producing things that have been of no avail or value whatever to the population of this country; and yet history fails to record a single case where any man has become a millionaire by farming the soil. It does show, however, thousands who have become multimillionaires by farming him. And yet we have wondered why the ambitious young man was always wanting to leave the farm. To-day you are asking him to return to the farm, and while your flattering words are still ringing in his ears, while you are depicting the beauty and independence of farm life, you are threatening to boycott the farm produce and threatening to make life on the farm less profitable. To-day there is a greater demand for the soil than ever before, because there is a growing belief that hereafter farm life will be more profitable. But you immediately check that tendency by attempting to strike a blow at farm products.

Mr. President, the farmer has never boycotted any article because of its high price. He has not been ignorant of the fact that in the commercial field he has for years been compelled to trade an article which cost him twice as much in expended effort as has been expended upon the article which he receives for it. But he has been hoping that the day of justice would soon dawn. At last he catches the glimpse of brighter hours to come. He feels that the sun of his prosperity is about to rise. He has not heretofore organized, as has every other industry in the country, for his own defense. But if, by any act, either legislative or boycotting, he finds that he will not be treated squarely, you will certainly hear from him. He is able to organize his forces into one of the most formidable bodies in this country. His work in that direction is already under way. By your action in boycotting his product you will give renewed grounds for a strong agricultural organization. When that has been accomplished he will meet you in the boycotting business, and when the farmer is stirred up to the defense of his rights you will find him the best boycotter on earth. He is used to hardships, used to rigid economy, and he has a decided advantage over the rest of the world in that he can get along without replenishing his stock of what he purchases from the world for an indefinite time, while you can not get along three days without that which his labor produces.

Mr. President, while this matter is under discussion I have before me a table that was made up by Mr. C. F. Rakow, who is a member of the American Society of Equity, a farmers' organization in my State, which I wish to present. He takes the value of all of our farms, all of our cattle, stock, and machinery that are necessary to operate those farms. Then he estimates the farmer's labor and the labor of his wife and his children at about the same rate that the ordinary laborer receives in the city, and makes an allowance for depreciation in the price of his stock, the same as any business man would do, and he draws a balance. He shows by this estimate that if you estimate the farmer's labor exactly the same as the labor of the artisan, the stonecutter, the bricklayer, or the carpenter in the city, the farmers of the country would be losing more than $2,000,000,000 a year. The reason they are not losing that sum is that under the exigencies of the case they are compelled to put in the labor of themselves and families at absolutely nothing in order to compute any compensation upon capital invested. I will ask that this table be printed and made a part of this address.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CRAWFORD in the chair). In the absence of objection, permission is granted.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not observe the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] present, and therefore will withhold the suggestion of an amendment in line 9, which would amend the amendment adopted yesterday evening in section 8. I do not know of any other amendment pending at the present time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

Mr. CARTER. Before stating the amendment or making any suggestion with reference to it, I prefer that the Senator from Iowa should be present. I supposed he was in the Chamber, but finding that he is not, I forego any reference to the proposed amendment at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The consideration of the amendment will be deferred until the return of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KEAN. We might have the amendment read.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not know why the amendment should not be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana requested that the amendment be not stated until the return of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS entered the Chamber.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Iowa is now in the Chamber. I will therefore move that the amendment yesterday adopted, found in section 8, on page 6, of the bill——

Mr. SMOOT. Of the reprint?

Mr. CARTER. Of the reprint—be amended by inserting after the word "charges," in line 9, the words "and to provide an adequate reserve," so that as proposed to be amended the text would read:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges, and to provide an adequate reserve, etc.

Mr. HEYBURN. "Adequate" for what?

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to ask the Senator what he is going to have an "adequate reserve" for?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I took occasion during the discussion of the bill the day before yesterday to refer to the fact that in Great Britain for a series of years postal savings were conducted with a slight annual profit. Following these years of profit came certain years during which small losses were encountered; that is, years during which the interest and expenses exceeded the income from the invested funds. Instead of changing the rate of interest to the depositor by lowering the amount, the board of trustees elected to pay the interest charge formerly paid, but to take the same out of the accumulated reserve. This was done for a number of years. After a time a profit began to accrue again without any change of the rate paid to the depositor. A small reserve is necessary in order to avoid sudden and unexpected changes in the rate of interest paid or demanded by the Government.

Stability is important in operations of this kind, and if a small reserve is accumulated, that reserve can be called upon as the governing force, overcoming temporary losses, and provide the means to meet engagements, notwithstanding the income for a given year may not be equal to the outlay for that year. I assume that the board, without this provision, would so prudently conduct the business as to accumulate a small amount each year in excess of the actual necessities; but, in order to make the right of the board clear in that behalf, I have suggested the amendment to provide an adequate reserve.

Mr. SHIVELY. Mr. President, let me inquire of the Senator on what page of the reprint does the amendment come in?

Mr. CARTER. On page 6 of the new print it is proposed to insert, after the word "charges," in line 9, the words "and to provide an adequate reserve."

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, inasmuch as this occurs in a part of the bill which has been amended upon my motion, I think possibly it is appropriate for me to say that I have no objection whatever to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana. As I said yesterday, I believe that the rate of interest ought to be uniform, and I was willing to leave it without any limitation, believing that the board could not and would not raise the rate to an impossible point simply to give it the power to withdraw the funds from the banks, if the effect of such an act would be to withdraw the funds from all the banks throughout the country.

The amendment proposed now is a change that substantially will leave the power of the board without restriction, because no one can determine for the board what an "adequate reserve" is. I assume the board would act conscientiously and intelligently about that; and, so far as I look at the matter, I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, instead of making the insertion of the new matter immediately after the word "charges," I ask that the new matter be inserted after the word "of," so that the text would read:

> Sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of and to provide an adequate reserve for the system herein established.

Mr. HEYBURN. This is the first provision in the bill that undertakes to provide for the payment of interest by the Government on——

Mr. CUMMINS. Section 6, if I may be permitted to state——

Mr. HEYBURN. I want to straighten it out; it has a kink or two in it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Section 6 provides for the payment of interest by the Government to the depositor. This section provides only for interest paid by the banks to the Government.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the point to which I am addressing my remarks. I say it is the first section that provides for the payment of interest to the Government by the banks receiving the deposits, and it says now, as proposed to be amended, that those banks shall pay a rate of interest to the Government of not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is reasonable to meet the expenses and interest charges of and to provide an adequate reserve. I think that amendment is not in the right place.

Mr. CARTER. An adequate reserve for the system.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but see the language—"nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of"—what? Of the reserve? That is the way it reads now.

Mr. CARTER. Of the system. I think that is the proper reading. There is a considerable difference in reading, according to punctuation, and so forth.

> No more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and the interest charges of and to provide an adequate reserve fund for the system herein established.

Mr. HEYBURN. The word "for" was omitted either because of my failure to hear it or otherwise. It is proposed that the banks shall pay such rate of interest as shall meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established. I have read that without the proposed amendment. The amendment only adds to that the creation of a reserve. Are those the only uses to which this interest is to be applied? It seems to me that the interest fund to be derived from the loaning of this money to the banks should have a wider application than those three items.

Mr. CARTER. I think——

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it not intended that the interest that the banks pay to the Government shall be used at least in part by the Government to pay the interest that it contracts to pay to the depositor?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CARTER. The interest charges constitute the obligation of the Government to the depositor, and the charges referred to cover the interest to be paid to the depositor.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very loose way of stating an item of so much importance, stated in the body of a general expression—to pay interest charges. Interest charges to whom? Interest charges upon what?

Mr. SMOOT. Upon deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. We can talk it here, but it is not in the bill. It is easy enough to state what it is for, but it should be stated in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it is stated in the bill, because it says they shall pay interest at the rate of 2 per cent.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is in another section and another part of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That is the only interest in the bill, and referring to the question of interest, it certainly refers to the interest to be paid upon deposits, and it could not apply to anything else.

Mr. HEYBURN. That still would be outside of the record. The remarks of the Senator from Utah will not accompany the law.

That is not all that occurs to me in regard to this. It certainly is an insufficient statement of an important item or principle in legislation. Mr. President, it is to be 2¼ per cent, and it is also to be reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses, and so forth. Why reasonably? Why not provide that it shall be sufficient? What condition, less than the actual amount necessary to pay it, constitutes "reasonably sufficient?"

I make these suggestions, and I think it would be profitable to give them some heed. I repeat, why limit the provision for the payment of these items that are an absolute charge, if they are anything, by using the words "reasonably sufficient?" Would a thousand dollars less than the amount necessary to pay the obligations of the Government be reasonably sufficient, or would an amount, say $10,000 less be reasonably sufficient, or would an amount $1 less be reasonably sufficient to meet a fixed obligation of the Government? I submit that question to the Senator from Montana for his consideration. Votes for this bill will probably be given or withheld according to the ultimate provisions which it contains.

Mr. CARTER. Is not that rather a rash statement?

Mr. HEYBURN. I am speaking on the basis of the conscientious principle——

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. HEYBURN. I beg pardon. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PAGE. I think myself in patching up this amendment we have, perhaps, done so at the sacrifice of clearness. For instance, in line 7 we speak of the interest charge. Then we interpolate something in regard to expenses, and then in line 10 we return again to the question of interest. As the Senator from Idaho has been talking it seemed to me that that might be made a little clearer by changing the amendment to read in this way:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges of the system herein established, including loss by the insolvency of banks or otherwise, and to provide an adequate reserve.

Mr. HEYBURN. That certainly would improve the form.

Mr. President, this amendment would result in the necessity of publishing quotations as to what rate of interest the Government was paying every day, just as consols are reported to-day, because it says that they shall charge not less than 2¼ per cent for the use of this money by the banks. "Not less than" means they may charge anything more than that. "Postal rates," I suppose, or "postal interest," would be the form of the quotation. January 1, 2¼ per cent, February 1, 3 per cent, March 1, 2¼ per cent again, April 1, 4 per cent.

That which can be done in legislating must be presumed to be done under any law. That is the rule, and the only safe rule. If the Government can change the rate of interest that the banks shall pay, when may the change be made operative and how? Shall it be by an order emanating from a board not now existing under any law, or will it be by executive order? How will the rate of interest be changed? Will it be from day to day or from month to month? If I am answered that it will probably not be changed, then, I say, why make the provision for the change? Why provide for the possibility of danger if no danger may arise? I do not believe that a provision such as that, involving such large sums of money, loaned under such unusual conditions to the banks, will meet with the approval of any investigator or sound thinker upon this question.

Mr. CARTER. Would the Senator so frame the bill that the board of trustees would be required to hold the money perpetually on deposit at the rate at which they first made the deposit?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; if they put it there at all. Undoubtedly, if there is anything on earth that will relieve this bill against the criticism that it will necessarily draw, it is that it shall be uniform and that it shall be stable and unchanging.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the Senator——

Mr. HEYBURN. And if you make a provision that the board of trustees, an unknown body, shall control the rate of interest which shall be paid for the hundreds of millions of dollars by these banks, you put into their hands a power that can shake the financial affairs of this country to the foundation any day.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the Senator if he would, in the first instance, compel the board to fix the rate abnormally high in order to be sure of its adequacy to meet the demand upon it, or would he deprive the board of the privilege of fixing the rate at 2¼ per cent to begin with, and, if that was found inadequate, to increase it later on?

Mr. HEYBURN. Inadequate for what?

Mr. CARTER. To meet interest charges, expenses, and to provide a reasonable reserve fund.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is the Senator contemplating that this money will not be taken by the banks, and therefore that the interest received will not offset the interest to be paid? Is that possible?

Mr. CARTER. The interest received will, of course, offset the interest to be paid, plus expenses, if the interest rate is high enough. But 2¼ per cent might prove inadequate. Would the Senator then say that because it proves inadequate the board ought to be powerless to increase the rate to make it sufficient?

Mr. HEYBURN. That introduces an element of danger which I do not suppose anybody would contemplate for a moment—that the board may shift from day to day and hour to hour this interest rate upon the vast sum of money that is in the banks. Where would the stability of the bank holding the money be if the rate of interest that it should pay on a deposit of a million dollars should vary from one day to another?

Mr. CARTER. The bank would be advised under this very amendment that no greater rate would be charged than was necessary to pay the 2 per cent to the depositor and the running expenses.

Mr. HEYBURN. How can the bank know whether or not that necessity will arise? The alternative right exists, according to this bill, in the board, and of course the bank would be advised, if they were going to take the money, under the provisions of this bill, of this contingency; but would they take it under such a contingency?

Mr. CARTER. We believe that one-fourth of 1 per cent will pay all the expenses and meet all the charges against this fund.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is that belief based upon?

Mr. CARTER. But we may be mistaken.

Mr. HEYBURN. But you must not be mistaken in legislating.

Mr. CARTER. We lack that infallibility which the Senator claims for himself.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. All together we do not possess that infinite wisdom which would enable us to determine with absolute accuracy just what the charges will be. We know we will be required to pay only 2 per cent per annum, but we do not know what the volume of expense will be. It will probably be covered by one-fourth of 1 per cent.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the committee an estimate of the expense? Have they entered into that question at all?

Mr. CARTER. We can only estimate it upon the basis of cost elsewhere, and I think from that estimate, made by the Postmaster-General two or three years ago, we are justified in believing that one-quarter of 1 per cent will pay all the expenses.

Mr. HEYBURN. How much was the amount? What was the estimate?

Mr. CARTER. The estimate was that all expenses would be met by one-quarter of 1 per cent on the deposits.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is the statement of a principle. But does the Senator know the amount estimated as necessary to execute this kind of a measure?

Mr. CARTER. Of course, the amount necessary to meet the expenses will be dependent upon the volume of business, to no inconsiderable extent. We do know that if the business is small, the expenses will be correspondingly light. If the business is large, a larger sum in the aggregate will be required to pay the expenses; but the one-quarter of 1 per cent margin will likewise make a larger sum total.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator a question. Turning to section 10, which provides for that question, it provides that additional compensation shall be allowed postmasters at post-offices of the fourth class for the transaction of postal savings deposit business. Who is to fix and determine the additional compensation?

Mr. CARTER. The board of trustees will determine the additional compensation. It can not exceed one-quarter of 1 per cent to fourth-class postmasters, and it may not be uniform. Offices doing a small business may be paid a larger percentage than offices doing a large volume of business. I can conceive, for instance, in a mining camp, where only a fourth-class post-office exists, that the deposits in the postal savings of that community may at a quarter of 1 per cent furnish the postmaster more compensation than his regular post-office business furnishes. In another case, the amount of business done in a farming community might not be as large in proportion to population as in a coal-mining camp, or a quartz-mining camp, or a manufacturing center.

Mr. HEYBURN. The amount, one-fourth of 1 per cent, is exactly the difference between the rate of interest paid by the Government and the rate of interest that is paid to the Government, is it not?

Mr. CARTER. It is the difference.

Mr. HEYBURN. So that it would cancel absolutely all profit which the Government has by reason of charging a higher rate of interest than it receives.

Mr. CARTER. It is quite probable; and I think in the workings of the system it will be found that, in the main, not to exceed one-eighth of 1 per cent will be paid to the fourth-class postmasters.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is that based upon? Has the committee a statement showing the basis of that estimate which can be investigated by the members of this body?

Mr. CARTER. I will be glad to get the figures of the Postmaster-General, if the original data are required.

Mr. HEYBURN. Did the committee have those figures before it?

Mr. CARTER. The committee had the statement of the Postmaster-General of his conclusion, after a very careful consideration of the subject.

Mr. HEYBURN. In writing?

Mr. CARTER. I think the statement was made before the committee and reduced to writing.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the provision in the amendment that has been suggested by the Senator is to meet conditions which may arise by the payment of additional compensation under section 10, at least in part, is it?

Mr. CARTER. The maximum compensation to be paid under section 10 is fixed in section 10 at one-quarter of 1 per cent to certain classes of postmasters. Postmasters of the fourth class, as the Senator knows, are paid compensation based upon the volume of business transacted in the respective offices for the preceding year. The presidential postmasters, on the other hand, are paid fixed salaries, which are increased from time to time, as the volume of business in the office increases. But their salaries are generally sufficient to secure competent men to transact the business. In the small fourth-class post-offices, however, it happens we must allow some compensation for the transaction of this work, because the salaries are not adequate to cover the additional trouble and the value of the time to be employed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Has the committee any figures to submit as to the proportion of money that would be received in the fourth-class post-offices?

Mr. CARTER. We have endeavored to set forth in the report the number of fourth-class offices and the number of first, second, and third class offices.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator give me a reference to the page where that is set forth?

Mr. CARTER. In the course of a moment I will endeavor to do that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is the Senator sure it is set forth in the report?

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will find, I think, that it is set forth in the report; but he will find it in more convenient form in the RECORD to-day, and I will endeavor to refer him to the RECORD.

Mr. HEYBURN. I find that the report refers almost entirely to foreign countries.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will find on page 1432 of the RECORD—yesterday's proceedings—a statement inserted which shows that there are 38,805 fourth-class post-offices now issuing money orders, and 7,202 presidential offices; that is, offices of the first, second, and third class.

Mr. HEYBURN. I find it in the statement introduced yesterday by the Senator from Montana.

Mr. President, more than four-fifths of the post-offices that would receive this fund come under the provisions of section 10 of this act. It is entirely probable that that proportion of the receipts from postal savings deposits would be in the fourth-class offices, and 38,805 postmasters would probably receive all of the profit that is provided for between the amount of interest paid by the Government and the amount of interest received by it. There are only 5,000 postmasters who are excluded from this increased salary.

Mr. CARTER. That is correct, except it is about 2,000 short.

Mr. HEYBURN. Where is the Government going to get the money to meet the expenses of this system if the profit on the interest account is used for another purpose? Where is the Government going to get it? Is it going to get it out of the proposed amendment just submitted by the Senator from Montana, which carries with it the power to charge a higher rate of interest to banks, and is it going to interject into this bill at this stage the element of uncertainty as to what rate of interest the Government will charge the banks, or are we going to legislate along definite lines?

One of the prime elements of the law is that it shall be certain. I am trying to bring out at this time, which is the proper hour at which these things should be brought out, the real facts as to the bill, its character and its effect, should it be enacted into law, and to pass it over, merely because it comes with the recommendation of this or that man or this or that body of men, at this stage would be criminal, because it is going to be one of those things which, once adopted, we can only be relieved from through a scandal. We have had one experience in this Government, and it is a scandal to-day, and that is the old Freedmen's Savings Bank.

Mr. GALLINGER. Were not the depositors paid?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; they have not been paid; and a bill drawn so loosely as this will inevitably result in a difference of opinion—first, as to the power of the board; second, as to the wisdom of the board—and that will always be a divided opinion, and then it will be followed by an opinion that the whole system is so carelessly flung out into the air as to cast the reflection of carelessness upon the body that enacted it.

Mr. President, I have no love for the position in which I find myself in regard to this bill in this body. It is not attractive to me. I would rather be relieved from it. But the bill is here for responsible action, and the name of every Member of the Congress of the United States will be held by our constituencies as a guaranty for the wisdom of it. It will not be sufficient to say that it was reported favorably from the committee and seemed all right on its face, and there seemed to be no general objection to it, and we let it go through. We did that with another piece of legislation within the easy memory of everyone present, and there are a great many interrogations raised from the business world to-day as to why you did not give it careful consideration and embody in it protection against conditions which are to-day found very harassing to good men.

Mr. CUMMINS. Is the Senator from Idaho referring to the tariff bill passed at the recent session?

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I am referring to a provision that was attached to it, which I voted against, the only vote I cast, I think, against it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The corporation tax?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; the corporation tax.

Mr. CUMMINS. I joined the Senator in voting against it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will not undertake at this time to go into any consideration of it. The people are considering it, even those who demanded it in their frenzy for getting at somebody.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. In a moment. This question is large enough itself to occupy our attention now, and so far as I am concerned, while I might perhaps be justified in saying I saw the outcome of it, I am going to take time enough to say what I have to say, so that I will not be ashamed to read the record of what I did in this hour. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in addition to the estimate made by Postmaster-General Meyer some years ago with reference to the expense and the sufficiency of one-fourth of 1 per cent to meet the charges and expenses outside of interest, I have a letter from the Postmaster-General, dated January 8, 1910, covering this subject. Inasmuch as it is quite brief and was sent in response to inquiries presented by me to that official, I will ask the Senator to permit the reading of the response at this time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

JANUARY 8, 1910.

MY DEAR SIR: In response to your personal inquiry, I beg to state that, in my view, operated under a suitable law and controlled by proper regulations, postal savings depositories would not in the long run impose any additional financial burden upon the Government. In this connection I said in my annual report:

"Under a statute and regulations properly drawn and enforced, a postal savings-bank system in this country would be self-supporting. A fractional margin between the rate of interest paid to the depositors and the rate realized by the Government on redeposits would easily cover the cost of conducting the business. Only a moderate original outlay would be required for special equipment. Improvements in the postal service now being made should place the department in such condition that the additional work and responsibility incident to the operation of postal savings banks could be readily assumed."

The margin referred to between the interest paid to the Government and that which it in turn would allow depositors should be sufficient to defray all charges, including the necessary initial expense of preparing blanks, books, and instructions. The rapid extension of the money-order feature of the postal service, until at the present time 51,824 offices out of a total of 59,578 are equipped to issue and pay money orders, might be regarded in the nature of a valuable preliminary step in preparing the service to undertake the additional duties and responsibilities which necessarily would be entailed. At each of the 51,824 money-order post-offices there is presumably at least one person competent to undertake postal savings business; and, except in the case of offices below the presidential grade, their doing so would not necessarily add greatly to the cost of the service. At some of the larger offices additional clerks would be necessary. It is impossible to foretell with any degree of accuracy just how many would be required. In the nature of things their number and total compensation would fluctuate with the volume of business transacted, and should not be allowed to pass the limits dictated by prudent management. The employment of officers and clerks at the central office would be governed by similar considerations.

It is not believed that postal savings depositories would interfere in any way with the ordinary operations of the postal service. In this respect comparison may, with propriety, be made to the money-order service, which certainly has had no deleterious effect.

Predicated upon the experience of other countries and taking into consideration the fact that in all probability a lower rate of interest will be allowed here than in any other instance, I consider it safe to say that a system of postal savings depositories, wisely planned and administered, will prove to be a success from a financial standpoint.

Yours, very truly,

F. H. HITCHCOCK,
Postmaster-General.

HON. THOMAS H. CARTER,
United States Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is just as good an example of glittering generalities as some of the provisions of this measure. He speaks of the establishment of the office and the arrangement in Washington to carry out this law. I have not taken up that question for consideration yet, but I have conferred with men whose judgment is very good, and the conclusion stated has been that it would take at least 5,000 clerks to take care of tabulating and keeping track of 5,000,000 accounts. I am inclined to think that that is not only a conservative but a very conservative estimate.

That is a charge, with the average salary paid that class of officers, of $5,000,000 a year, to be paid for executive services here in Washington. The postmasters and their clerks will represent certainly 60,000, if every one of those fourth-class offices is entitled to an extra clerk, and they probably will get them; instead of being 44,000 it will be 75,000 clerks, an addition there, we will say, for round figures, of 30,000, which means $3,000,000 more.

Now, you have $8,000,000 for clerk hire. Out of what fund is that going to be realized, when you have absorbed four-fifths of the profits that can possibly be derived from this enterprise by the Government in the payment of extra service to 44,000 fourth-class postmasters? Out of what fund are you going to pay these extra clerks? It does not need any elaborate calculation to demonstrate the fact that you are going to go into the fund itself, or else into the Treasury of the United States, for about $8,000,000 on some appropriation bill.

The bill provides that this money, when it is deposited in the Government Treasury, shall still be subject to withdrawal by this board; that is, they think that it can. Let me call your attention to this provision:

Provided, That in the Treasury or with the Treasurer of the United States postal savings funds shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act and not otherwise.

There is a contemplated violation of the prohibition of the Constitution, which says that public moneys can not be withdrawn from the Treasury except pursuant to direct appropriations based upon estimates. That is what the Constitution says, but this law proposes a different method. The minimum sum in the Treasury of the United States subject to those provisions will exceed $80,000,000 in any event. That is the obvious result of the provision of the bill. And you propose to draw that at the option and will of the board, and for such purposes as they may denominate, in the face of the constitutional prohibition.

You will get just so far as it becomes known that you are attempting or contemplating it, and the Comptroller or some proper officer of the Treasury will be reminded that it would be a violation of the Constitution of the United States. Suppose this board, with this 10 per cent reserve fund in the Treasury of the United States, should order that that money should be drawn from there and invested in interest-bearing securities, do you suppose the Treasurer would honor the draft? He would say, "Where is the act of Congress that authorizes me to pay out or transfer the public moneys of the United States, except pursuant to an appropriation based upon estimates, as provided in the Constitution?" Would Congress then be called upon at every recurring session to make an appropriation under the urgent deficiency bill?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator will remember that yesterday there was stricken from the bill the provision with regard to the reserve fund to be deposited in the Treasury. There is no such provision in the bill now before the Senate. Therefore no moneys would be required to be withdrawn from the Treasury.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, of course I have the bill before me, showing that the provision of yesterday was abandoned, but the principle of yesterday is attempted to be incorporated into this bill just the same under general language more dangerous than that which was stricken out. It is in section 8, the one that we have under consideration. Let us see what we have for it:

Provided, That postal savings funds deposited in any State or Territory in which no provision is made by law governing the investment of savings-bank funds may be invested in the same character of securities in such State or Territory as are made the subject of investment of saving-bank funds by the laws of the States of New York or California.

The language stricken out was the following:

Provided further, That said board of trustees shall maintain a reserve fund, either with the Treasurer of the United States or the banks as herein provided, not more in amount than 10 per cent of the total funds deposited in postal savings depositories.

Now, that was stricken out because, perhaps, of the suggestions which were made yesterday that they would not be able, at their will and pleasure, to handle the fund; that it could only be gotten out of the Treasury, as I suggested yesterday, pursuant to an appropriation. It evidently occurred to those in charge of the bill that they must get that money where they could handle it easier and with less restrictions.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. I am responsible for the amendment under which those lines were stricken out, and I disavow any such motive. My purpose was to allow all the money to bear interest. Money in the Treasury could not earn interest, and therefore it seemed to me to meet the requirement of the bill that the money must be earning interest; that, substantially, all of it must be earning interest.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I did not, of course, intend to impugn the motives of the Senator. I was impugning the language. There is a difference there. The Senator is acting entirely within conscientious lines in dealing with the bill and endeavoring, if he can—which he can not—to carve out of it something that will be, at least in a measure, free from the objections which have been pointed out.

Mr. President, that was stricken out; and now we come in with a provision providing for the hiring, as they say in some sections of the country, of this money to the banks, if the banks will hire it, making no provision for the money or the disposition of it where the banks will not hire it except its investment in fluctuating securities.

Since I have been on the floor I sent for the financial statement of this morning. I had it here a moment ago. I will state it, however. The moneys, that are not now to be held in the Treasury of the United States, because it would be inconvenient to the board to use them, and I say that in a proper manner, are to be invested in a class of securities that have fluctuated since the 4th day of December, according to the statement, to an extent that would represent a pretty large percentage of this reserve fund in values.

The Government to-day, of course, is not requiring large deposits of securities for government moneys, because there is very little government money in the depositories. We had $10,000,000 of this class, of what I call "careless securities," up on the 4th day of December, and we have something like two million of it up now.

It means this: That the status of $10,000,000 of securities has been shifted and changed by operation of the affairs of the Government in sixty days.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Here is what is left of the provision for the disposition of the funds that the banks will not hire and the Government can not invest in securities; that is, in such securities as the Government is accustomed to take—

If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed—

That is, at the rate of interest which this board may fix—said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board.

Now, when they are in the Treasury, will they be in his hands as treasurer of this board, or will they be a part of the public moneys of the United States? That question is left to conjecture, but it ought to be determined. We should have some expression in regard to that, that in recurring to the RECORD we would know what the committee thought would be the status of that money, whether he would hold it as treasurer of the board or as Treasurer of the United States.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly. I read from page 7.

Mr. CARTER. The language on page 7 is—

If such bank or banks—

Is that the portion the Senator referred to?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I read that.

Mr. CARTER (reading):

If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board.

The Senator will perceive that it does not provide that the funds shall be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, but with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be ex officio treasurer of the board. These moneys are not coming into the Treasury of the United States, nor do they assume the character of the funds at any time made subject to the constitutional provision to which the Senator has referred.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I think if anything would cast discredit upon the bill, a provision like that would accomplish it, that you are going to put $80,000,000 in the custody of a man who is treasurer of a board and make no provision for the security of that money. There is nothing like it in this Government.

Mr. CARTER. Does the Senator realize that that treasurer can not in any manner, shape, or form dispose of a dollar except under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General of the United States? We do not place $80,000,000 in the possession of a man who may go across to Canada and bid us good-by. He may only use that money as the board may prescribe.

Mr. HEYBURN. The poor wretch who a few days since commenced upon a term of service under sentence of the court was in exactly the same position. He might not use a dollar except under the direction and control of the board of directors of the bank.

Now, I am casting no aspersions upon any man. I am prophesying no degradation of any man. I am merely saying that there is no other instance in this Government or in business where we provide that a fund of this kind shall be placed in the hands of a man because he is Treasurer of the United States, without any provision for accounting, disbursement, or responsibility. No such proposition was ever made before. But I will read on. We now have the money in the hands of this treasurer:

And may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order—

That is, the order of the board—for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, or in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits are received.

That classification includes ordinary promissory notes, two-name paper. Is the Government going to loan this money? Is it going to propose to loan this money upon that class of securities?

I may not be demonstrating the wisdom of this legislation as it should be, but I am directing my efforts to demonstrate the fact that the bill is not a safe or proper bill to be passed in this body. No burden rests upon any Senator to perform the work of the committee. It is the duty of the committee to bring a measure to this body safely drawn and that represents legislation which will effectuate a purpose.

I on yesterday suggested the only character of a postal savings bank that I would support, and I repeat it, because the statement is brief. I will support no postal savings-bank law that provides for the Government of the United States paying interest and loaning money to recoup itself; in other words, going into the banking business. Even ordinary banks in their inception held money, just as the Government would hold it under those conditions, as a custodian. The banks of Venice, which was the first seat of banking, where the banking business as we know it to-day was invented, could not use the money of a depositor. They provided safe-keeping for money and property, but they could not use a dollar of it. Out of that condition the banking system of to-day has grown. I am not, especially on this occasion, going to make war upon it or do more than merely suggest the fact.

Mr. President, I suggested that notes and mortgages and two-name paper were within the list of securities upon which the institutions named in section 8 of the bill could loan money. I verified that statement by inquiry of a member of this body who has knowledge upon that subject. Are you going to provide that these moneys may be loaned upon that class of security? That is carrying it further than it has ever been proposed to carry it before. I shall just call attention to that fact; and it behooves the committee having charge of the bill when those objections are pointed out to propose some remedy.

The bill should go back to the committee, if it is a bill. This skeleton should go back to the committee with instructions to place some sinews and flesh upon it that will hold it together.

I have no hesitation in saying that, in my judgment, for what it is worth, the failure to provide for the manner of receiving and disbursing this fund was because the committee did not feel that it had on hand the wisdom that would enable it to do it. They undertook it a year ago, and in the face of criticism they abandoned it. The attempt that was written in the bill of a year ago does not appear in this bill. They have so completely repudiated the wisdom of last year that they do not even refer to it as a text or utter a word about it. No; they say, in effect, we create a board of three men and authorize them to create and constitute a system of postal savings banks and make all law relative to it. You do not even restrict them in the use of the money according to the methods ordinarily adopted in legislation. Then here is the amendment:

Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees—

Not secured according to law. That expression does not arise anywhere in the bill, I think, because there is no law to be "according to," but according to "the satisfaction of the board of trustees"—trustees for whom, I will ask the Senator in charge of the bill? For whom are they trustees, the Government or the depositor?

Mr. CARTER. Both.

Mr. HEYBURN. In a contest between the depositor and the Government whom would they represent, which of the "both?"

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I will only give the Senator the amount of rest which seems necessary in order to avoid having a statement too extravagant go unchallenged. The board of trustees will occupy the same relation to the postal savings system that any board of trustees occupies to a created entity over which they have jurisdiction and control for the purposes named in the bill and subject to the conditions and limitations of the law.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, subject to the conditions and limitations that should be in the law and are not. The proviso reads:

That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors—

You can draw it out of the bank now for only this purpose:

The depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act.

That is, you may draw out of the banks to the extent necessary to recoup the Government for loss. Then what becomes of the fund? What becomes of the discrepancy that must necessarily exist in a case of that kind by reason of the drawing out of this money? There would be no condition under which there would not be a discrepancy, because you draw from the principal. The provision reads that the money "shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it." When the banks are no longer willing to pay interest on the money for which they have no market and no use, then, I suppose, it would be withdrawn, and these trustees would hunt a market for the money. If they failed to find one that would yield 2¼ per cent or 2 per cent, they would have to pay the interest to the depositors out of the public funds of the United States.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Right at that point I want to suggest to the Senator from Idaho that there is in all probability upward of $6,000,000,000 in the banks of the United States upon which there is no interest paid. If the Government proposes to establish the precedent of paying interest on deposits, and thereby force the depositories of this vast sum of money to pay interest on deposits, then the borrower, whether he be a prosperous man or otherwise, would be obliged to pay the higher interest on loans. The result would be that our action would tend to increase the rate of interest and the burden which the borrower will have to bear in ordinary enterprises.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. Along that line I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that every dollar of money that he has reference to is deposited in national or state commercial banks and not in savings banks. There is nearly twice that amount of deposits in the savings banks that does draw interest; it is deposited as a savings account, and moneys deposited under this bill is virtually a savings account.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. But I made that suggestion because in time of stringency, if the Government puts its hand out, takes this money in, and pays a fair rate of interest on it, I think it is reasonable to suppose that noninterest-bearing deposits will be transferred from the channels of business into the Government's hands. Then it becomes incumbent upon the Government to loan it out again, and the Government must loan it out at such rate as will pay back the Government's obligation to the original depositor and the charges of administration.

Mr. SMOOT. What the Senator fears can never happen under the provisions of this bill, because if the money is drawn from the banks and placed in the post-offices as a deposit on account of the fear of the bank failing or otherwise, the Government turns right around and deposits that same money back in the bank and it can not be taken out of the channels of trade.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I understand that; but the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] must admit that by that process you have burdened the money with at least an interest charge of 2¼ per cent, which otherwise bore no burden, which the borrower might perhaps get at a less rate of interest than he could if you did not have that permanent charge against it.

Mr. SMOOT. But, Mr. President, if this bill did not provide some mode of putting the money back into the channels of trade, that identical money, withdrawn from the banks, would go into old stockings, into hiding places, and out of trade channels. I think, so far as the business of the country is concerned, they could well afford in times of stress to pay 2¼ per cent to keep that money in the channels of trade.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator from Idaho will permit me, I want to make this observation: We fix the minimum rate of interest in this bill at not less than 2¼ per cent. We do not fix the maximum in definite language. I think the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] yesterday helped that feature somewhat, and I was glad to see his amendment adopted. But I make the prediction that if this bill becomes a law and is as popular in America as similar legislation is in France or in England or in Japan, it will be the football of politics; that the millions of depositors who are drawing 2¼ per cent interest will be appealed to by demagogues at election times and told, "If you vote for this party or that party, we will double your return on this money." I am afraid you are putting into the hands of unscrupulous politicians an opportunity to array a large army of depositors—citizens and aliens—against the Government on the slightest provocation, and that the rate of interest and the character of the investment to be made with this fund will subject the Government to caustic criticism and possibly misjudgment in the years to come.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would suggest in connection with that that you must bear in mind that no member of this board of trustees is an elective officer at all; that these are all purely political offices. I want to proceed to the proposition on page 9, in section 8 of the bill. We have been dealing with section 8. It provides:

And no person connected with the Post-Office Department shall disclose to any person other than the depositor the amount of any deposit, unless directed so to do by the Postmaster-General.

That undertakes to substitute the Postmaster-General of the United States for the law officer of the State and the county in cases of garnishment or execution. What do you suppose the States will say to that?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. HEYBURN. Certainly.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the Senator from Idaho, I think, will agree with me, on a moment's reflection, that the funds deposited in the post-office will not be subject to garnishment. The United States is the depositor, and the United States can not be sued and can not be garnisheed. So the contingency just suggested could not possibly arise.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the Senator lost the point of my criticism. It was against any law which would enable a depositor to place himself in that position. I am perfectly well aware of the restrictions in the execution of a writ, but I object to a law which enables a man to put himself in that position.

Mr. CUMMINS. I shall not argue the point which the Senator from Idaho now makes. I only corrected what I thought was a misapprehension under his former statement, namely, that the law officer of the State could not reach this sum by garnishment.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a result that flows from an act of the individual who takes money that would otherwise be subject to execution and places it beyond the reach of execution.

Now, I come to probably—I was going to say the worst provision of this bill, but it would be pretty difficult to say which is the worst——

Mr. CUMMINS. Make no rash assertions about it.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; I shall not indulge in comparisons. I call attention to section 3, which provides—

That accounts may be opened and deposits made in any postal savings depository established under this act by any person of the age of 10 years or over, in his or her own name.

I pause there; but there are other provisions which follow it. Contemplate the situation. A family of half a dozen children over 10 years of age and under the age of responsibility getting hold of money, it matters not how, placing it in a postal savings bank, and receiving a credit from the Government of the United States that can not be attached. The money passes out of their control. They have a little book, which says that these children—not sui juris—have a claim against the Government of the United States for $3,500. That, under the law, is the property of the parent, and liable and responsible for the maintenance of the household and the care and the education of the children. The parent's consent is not required. The child might take the parent's money and deposit it in the post-office. What proceedings could be appealed to to recover that money? The thief might take the product of his night's adventure and deposit it in the post-office, and the lips of the postmaster would be sealed. He could not even say, "Yes, Guy Fawkes placed $500 here this morning." Is not that worth considering? Are we going to open up an avenue of this kind and seal the lips of the officer of the Government against giving any information? Yet there is something that, as was suggested, is not the subject of garnishment.

There is no provision for the transfer of the ownership of this pass book; it is not made transferable from one person to another; yet this deposit has been made, and the only evidence of it is the pass book in the possession of the wrongdoer or the irresponsible depositor. It seems to me that any law dealing with this question should make ample provision against such conditions and should preserve rights.

It would become a favorite means of disposing of ill-gotten money, pilfered from the table or the pocket, or how, it matters not, by putting it beyond the reach of inquiry behind the sealed lips of the Government of the United States.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I should like to know whether the Senator from Idaho believes that it would be proper to authorize every postal clerk and person dealing with post-office matters to go out on the public streets and proclaim just the amount deposited every day by each man, woman, and child in the community, and make it the subject of current conversation? Does the Senator know of any bank anywhere that would for one moment tolerate the action of an employee in going out into the crossroads places and telling all about the private business and the deposits of individual depositors of the bank? How long would the Senator continue to do business with a bank which authorized its clerks to go out and tell all about the deposits and the amount thereof, and his debts or the amount of his debts? Of course the Senator knows that there is absolutely no virtue whatever in the contention that this provision prohibiting an employee of the Government from disclosing the character of the deposit is contrary to good, sound public policy or public morals.

Mr. HEYBURN. The question was not involved in my consideration of the propriety of providing a means for secreting funds that did not belong to the parties secreting them, though, of course, we know that any bank may be garnisheed and required to make known to the officers of the law the credit that is held in favor of any individual. As to whether I would send clerks out to herald it on the streets is not involved. The Senator knows that just as well as he would know it after I explained to him what my views would be.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Idaho makes special objection to that provision of the proposed law which prohibits the employees of the Post-Office Department from giving out information concerning the current accounts of depositors.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Montana never was more mistaken in his life. I do not object to it at all. It would be utterly improper to allow these officers to give out the information. What I object to is creating a condition where the question may be raised at all.

In the first place, I am opposed to allowing children 10 years of age to be made the medium of covering up the cash of the household against its responsibilities; that is one reason, and inasmuch as it might amount readily to a difference between ten years and twenty-one years, it might be a twenty-year proposition. Each child depositing $500 a year in its own name would have $5,000, and a family of five children, we will say, or six children, might have enough money to stake that family and escape from its creditors in the bosom of Uncle Sam, and you could not get at it.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask the Senator from Idaho what the exemption from attachment and seizure under the operation of law is in the State of Idaho as to a resident of that State?

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have in my committee room all the statutes of the State of Idaho, and the law upon that subject is scattered through a number of volumes. If I thought that it would add to the wisdom brought to bear upon this question, I would bring them in and read what the law is; but it is not necessary at all.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think the Senator, with his usual directness, will admit that all of the States exempt from attachment and execution sums varying from $1,000 to $5,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is right.

Mr. CARTER. Including the homestead value, the books of the professional man, the tools and implements of the farmer, the tools of a mechanic, and so on, to an extent that frequently involves much more than $5,000.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; and this would add that much more to it.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, if the savings of the poor are not a subject for some little protection during their accumulation, then I am not a good judge of what is rational public policy.

Mr. HEYBURN. The poor. Mr. President, I traveled on one occassion with a man who carried a savings-bank account of several thousand dollars. He owns more farms than any man within the sound of my voice, and yet he patronized savings banks. Does the Senator imagine for a moment that postal savings banks would be patronized only by the poor?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, we can only determine about what would be by that which we know to exist elsewhere. The fact is that between 40 and 50 per cent of the depositors in postal savings banks are children and over 15 per cent are laboring people.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the fund is not protected behind this cast-iron secrecy. You can probe the savings bank and test the bona fides of a deposit that is made by a parent out of his own money to the credit of a child for the purpose of relieving the account from liability under execution.

Mr. CARTER. Well, Mr. President, the Senator is endeavoring to determine an entire case upon an extravagant illustration.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is a very nice expression, and it will look well in the RECORD [laughter], but it is not pertinent to a fair consideration of the question now before us.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not wish to be regarded as impertinent in dealing with the Senator. My disposition is to be extremely courteous, as the Senator, I think, knows, but I take this to be true, that we can not legislate on any subject in this presence upon the theory that the average man is a crook. I believe the average man, the average woman, and the average child, if you please, throughout this country have characters that are honest, square, and decent, and the fact that some man may take advantage of this postal-savings institution to defeat his creditors is no argument at all calculated to justify us in denying a beneficial institution to a whole people. The fact that somebody is guilty of petty larceny is no reason why we should discontinue all business and business operations. It is true that abnormal conditions will be found in human nature, just as abnormal conditions will be found in the mountains, on the plains, and everywhere throughout nature; but the legislation of the Government is not conducted, except when dealing with criminal statutes, to apply to the abnormal. It is the normal with which we deal.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I were to express the strong impression made upon my mind by the remarks of the Senator and the sympathy that rang in the tones of his voice, I would move to amend by striking out the restriction against disclosure, resting upon the honesty of all the people and the lack of any necessity for any provision of law requiring them to refrain from giving information. This whole provision is based upon the necessity of putting these deposits behind the bars of secrecy, and why go away from that? It was a nice, eloquent flight the Senator gave us, but it is not applicable.

Mr. President, not only are the deposits of children provided for without requiring any consent or knowledge of the parent, but we find that money may be deposited by a married woman in her own name, free from any control or interference by her husband. It might be the husband's money. [Laughter.]

Mr. CARTER. Would the Senator put in the proposition that the husband might deposit without interference from his wife? [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, if I would put any provision in a skeleton like this, it would be a substantial one that would require open, candid, and businesslike rules of conduct.

Mr. CARTER. Then, the Senator would advise posting the names of the depositors in front of the post-offices and the amount of their daily balances?

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not reached that point of absurdity yet.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator will in due time, if he keeps on. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, the laws of some States, and perhaps of all States, make the property of the wife contribute, under limitations or without them, to the payment of the obligations of the household. This bill would permit the wife to deposit her money in the savings banks and it might be that the husband would have no money left. Is that the intention?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I do not express much sympathy with the husband who can not support his own family.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, he could do it provided he retained the money that came to him. I am casting no aspersion upon any woman or upon any man when I say we are not supposed to legislate upon the hypothesis that no legislation is necessary.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, in most of the States, as the Senator well knows, this provision would be wholly unnecessary. The enlightened course of modern legislation has brought us to a position in most of the States where wives may, without any interference, let, or hindrance on the part of their husbands, manage their own individual personal property.

Mr. HEYBURN. Their personal property that has not been acquired during coverture.

Mr. CARTER. Well, Mr. President, even such a limitation as that does not apply where a wife, even after marriage, through business operations that prove profitable, accumulates money. Under the laws of many of the States the husband can not interfere with any disposition she may think proper to make of her earnings or her savings.

Mr. HEYBURN. She must then become a feme sole trader.

Mr. CARTER. That is sometimes required.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is true of the State which the Senator in part represents.

Mr. CARTER. I think of the State of Montana that is true.

Mr. HEYBURN. And in the State I in part represent.

Mr. CARTER. That is by a mere declaration filed of her intention to become such.

Mr. HEYBURN. That her husband is unable and unwilling to support her. That is the preliminary in Montana and in Idaho.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator had better confine his remarks to Idaho in that particular, because it is not in the Montana statutes.

Mr. HEYBURN. I may surprise the Senator by producing the statute. Women may become feme sole traders in many States where the husband is either irresponsible or not inclined to take care of the family; and it is quite usual under such circumstances for the wife to file a declaration—and it must be under oath—of those facts. Thereupon, an order will be made declaring her a feme sole trader, authorized to acquire property and deal with it independent of her husband; but, in the absence of such a provision, the accumulated property after marriage is common property and subject to the common responsibility for the payment of expenses.

Mr. CARTER. In the absence of such a statute, the Senator well knows that at common law all the property of the wife belonged to the husband, and, as a matter of fact, she could not hold any individual property.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I read that in Blackstone.

Mr. CARTER. Yes; I know. Some time ago. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. The carrying out of this doctrine would permit a family of five children and a wife to accumulate in the neighborhood of from forty to fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. CARTER. That is, the grandchildren being imported into the transaction.

Mr. HEYBURN. No; take five living children and the wife, running ten years—because between the ages of 10 and 20 it is not unreasonable to contemplate five children [laughter] who may live to be 10 years of age——

Mr. CARTER. The Senator, in view of that contingency, thinks this bill ought to be amended. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, just a moment of privilege. I never deal in levity, and especially I never deal in levity that may possibly have a vulgar meaning. Just take that as a cue for any remarks I may make.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator is endeavoring to demonstrate mathematically that one family under this bill may accumulate and have in the post-office or post-offices forty or fifty thousand dollars. I assert that one family—five children, husband, and wife—can have, all told, but $3,500 in the postal savings bank, exclusive of accumulated interest, at any time.

Mr. HEYBURN. Thirty-five hundred dollars?

Mr. CARTER. Thirty-five hundred dollars—$500 a year each. That is the maximum limitation.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is for one year.

Mr. CARTER. They could not add to it as long as they have $500 on deposit.

Mr. HEYBURN. I do not find the limitation expressed in such language.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator will find it in the most explicit language.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, call my attention to the page, please.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will turn to page 5, he will find that limitation.

Mr. SMOOT. Page 5, line 4.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will turn to that page, he will observe the following proviso:

Provided, That the balance to the credit of any one person shall never be allowed to exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest.

That does not refer to one year or ten.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well, if that is confined to one year, then the suggestion of the Senator is correct that they might cover up $3,500.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is not confined to one year nor to ten years. It is clear, explicit, and unequivocal language, declaring that there shall never be to the credit of any account more than $500, exclusive of accumulated interest. It would be difficult to make language more explicit than that.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course the interest would be added, and the interest would be a considerable sum.

Mr. CARTER. I hope they would leave the money there.

Mr. HEYBURN. If the money of the family can be placed in the hands of children and put behind the bars of secrecy provided by this bill, and if the wife may deposit her $500 there, and then that would be an addition to the exemptions under the state law, I think you are giving a pretty wide latitude of protection.

Mr. CARTER. I realize that the Senator is serious, and is gravely apprehensive that this bill may be made a shield for those desiring to avoid the payment of their honest debts. It is true that the States have wisely provided liberal exemptions from seizure of property under process of law. But may not anybody, desirous of sequestering his estate and refusing to pay his debts, buy bonds now and lock them up in his safety-deposit vault or bury them in some corner of his lot? May he not with equal ease purchase stocks of any sort in the name of his children or the name of a neighbor and thus avoid the payment of his debts? If men are dishonest and are unwilling to pay their debts, they suffer a penalty which society imposes in being discredited and being denied that standing to which honorable dealings lead.

Mr. President, there might be a case now and then where a man would seek to avoid the payment of his grocery bill or doctor bill or drug bill by depositing money in the name of a child in a postal savings bank. But that man is infinitely more likely to pay his debts, after he has accumulated a little surplus and with it a certain self-respect, than he is if he never accumulates anything at all.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let me ask the Senator whether he thinks that the child should be allowed to make a deposit without the consent or against the wishes of the parent and put the money beyond the possibility of the parent's controlling its use?

Mr. CARTER. I do not know that the parent may not prohibit a bank from transacting business with a minor, but the fact is that banks all over the country now receive deposits from minors. No objection is made to it, and it is as a rule a most desirable practice. I should like to see every child in this country upon reaching the age of 10 given a practical lesson in saving by keeping an account at the post-office.

Mr. HEYBURN. How would it affect the law of inheritance? Would the inheritance run from the child or from the parent?

Mr. CARTER. That would depend upon the local statutes, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. I know; but at present the inheritance does not flow from a minor. This would change that law, would it? The child dying during minority, where would the money go?

Mr. CARTER. The estate of the child would be disposed of under the law of the locality of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then we would add to the existing condition of affairs the estate of children to be administered. Who would administer it?

Mr. CARTER. I presume that the local law would control in every case. There is nothing in this bill that disturbs existing legal relations in any State. It extends a privilege.

Mr. HEYBURN. Could the child withdraw this money from the postal savings fund without the consent of the parent?

Mr. CARTER. That we understand to be true.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then the parent would lose all control over this money that he perhaps had given the child or which the child may have taken possession of.

Mr. CARTER. I presume the gift would be made with the idea that the child would make use of the money, and most parents would be gratified to know that instead of spending the gift for trifles and toys the child had shown a disposition to save a little as against a rainy day. No great injury will flow from that.

Mr. HEYBURN. It is true to-day that people constantly open accounts with a savings bank in the name of a child, but then the relation of guardianship is not destroyed. The parent controls it under the law. A child is not at liberty to go and draw the money out of the savings bank against the wishes or without the consent of the parent, and this will necessitate the appointment of a guardian in every case of that kind where there is a controversy.

I realize the necessity and the desirability of encouraging a disposition to save money by children and by all people, but we are legislating here on the assumption that we will not disturb existing relations between the parent and the child; we will not give any advantages that do not exist to-day; and yet you are going to create an entirely new relation. And how will the child enforce a recovery of the money?

Mr. CARTER. A child would not be called upon to enforce a recovery. The Government of the United States——

Mr. HEYBURN. Would pay it to the child?

Mr. CARTER. The Government of the United States is a just Government, and it will not be necessary to enforce recovery.

Mr. HEYBURN. Will it pay it to the child?

Mr. CARTER. To the child; most assuredly.

Mr. HEYBURN. Even though the parent was of the opinion that a child of 10 or 11 years of age was not competent to take care of it?

Mr. CARTER. The deposit by the child would raise a reasonable presumption that the child knew what to do with money.

Mr. HEYBURN. That might be prompted perhaps by some one else than the child.

Now, I am going to close my criticism of this bill for the present by asking one or two questions. Out of what fund will the interest be paid? In the event that the Government did not realize enough money out of the funds that it had collected to pay interest, out of what fund would it be paid? Can the Senator tell me?

Mr. CARTER. The bill contemplates turning the surplus earnings into the postal revenues.

Mr. HEYBURN. Suppose there are no surplus earnings. There is no assurance there will be.

Mr. CARTER. It will devolve upon the board of trustees to guard that.

Mr. HEYBURN. This bill relies very largely upon things yet to be done—rules and regulations yet to be made. There is no existing law covering the subject at all; and should no rules and regulations be made, there would be no way of recovering this money from the banks.

Mr. President, my objections to this bill have been stated at great length, and I feel that I might apologize to those who have been present and those who have not been present for having detained the Senate so long. But I am thoroughly impressed with the conviction that this measure is as vicious as it can be; that it is laying the foundation for a trouble that will tease this Government for years to come; that it will probably result in the first flush of its operation in gathering up a large sum of money belonging to the people, which the people themselves have shown themselves capable of accumulating and preserving, and owned by people who have given no evidence of unfitness for the management of their affairs. They are going to be asked to turn it over, and without exactly understanding the workings of this law, they will probably turn it over, a large amount, and then we will find that the banks will not borrow the money when they can get noninterest-bearing money. We will have it on hand, and we will go into the stock market to buy stocks in competition with private enterprise, with the result that it will inflate the price of securities they bid for and they will not get enough of them, because there is not enough in existence to meet the requirements of this bill.

There are not enough private securities in the United States to afford security, dollar for dollar, of the fund that would be accumulated under this law in two years. What condition would the business world or the investing world be in if the Government had absorbed all the securities of the class proposed to be accepted under the provisions of this bill? The Government would hold them as security for deposits in the banks. The interest on them would go to the banks, if they were interest-bearing securities, and they would be withdrawn from the ordinary channels of business—I mean business in securities—and withdrawn perpetually. They would remain withdrawn.

There is no provision in this bill for the disposition of these securities when they mature. Nine-tenths of them will mature within ten years. There is no provision for a substitute for them. The issuer of the security would proffer payment, and it would have to be accepted. The interest would cease. Then what provision is made for a substitute to secure these deposits?

You are building up a great big financial ghost that will fade away and go down under its own weight and lack of strength to support itself. There is no provision, I repeat, for substituting the securities. The securities will not exist that are required under the law. What is the alternative? There is where danger comes. The only alternative is to put the money in the Treasury of the United States. The banks do not own and can not get securities enough to cover the deposits at the end of twenty-four months. They are not in existence, according to the financial records of the United States. We thrashed that question out when we were discussing the finance bill two years ago.

It is easy enough to say that the banks shall give security to the Government for the repayment of the money and specify the character of the securities. But if they do not exist or will not exist, your provision is absolutely futile, and we have no alternative, and we want none, under which the banks may hold money without security. Four hundred and sixty million dollars is the limit of the securities existing to-day which come within the provisions of this bill. And what are you going to do for securities against the deposits above that sum, if they were available? There is not a hundred million dollars of them available to-day. They could not be obtained. They are earning more money. They are performing more desirable functions for their owners.

Now, we pass a law; the deposits come in; and the Government looks around for an opportunity to comply with the next provision; that is, to sell the money in the market to the banks, with a limit upon the terms, so far as interest is concerned. It can not sell it for less than 2¼ per cent, and the banks can not get it even on those terms unless they put up securities within the class and character named in this bill, and when that period is reached, then this legislation will just melt down into a failure and tantalize us for years to come with a demand for legislation to relieve the situation. That is what it will do. And what can we do, then? The Postmaster-General or this board will say, "We have $500,000,000 for which we can find no market at the rate of interest we are required to charge;" or if they can find a proffer for it, they will say, "We have only offers from people who can not comply with the requirements of the law and give the security," and they will say to Congress, "What shall we do? Put it into the Treasury of the United States?" Where will the depositors be? It will be just as safe as possible, but the depositors can only get the money when we appropriate it to pay them; and do you think we will make an appropriation to pay them when they demand it? No. We will make an appropriation to return the money to them as the only way out of our present situation. That is what you have to face.

Mr. President, I think my conscience will be clear, whatever the fate of this bill may be, having expressed my views against its provisions, not in a revolutionary spirit, not for the purpose of antagonizing this measure merely because I want to antagonize it, but because it will not accomplish the purpose.

I have been reminded, I was going to say officially, that the pledge of the Republican platform demands that I vote for this bill. It does nothing of the kind. I am not going to stand here and speak disrespectfully of the Republican party, because the Republican party consists of every member of the party, and nothing less. The Republican platform to me contains every provision that ever was written in a Republican platform. No provision ever written in the Republican platform has been written out of it at any time. Good government, political and financial conscience, have always been sacred to the Republican party, and it has stood for it; and where men, in the carelessness of the hour or the real or imaginary stress of circumstances, have written wrong words in it, we have done just what the courts do. We do not accept those words as meaning the destruction of the Government or of the interest of the people. The principles for which the Republican party stands are not all contained in its last platform, and I can gather no wisdom from the composite and aggregate declarations of principles of the Republican party that compels me to vote for a measure so utterly wanting in wisdom and safety as the one before this body.

I have never had to apologize for my Republicanism in the long years that I have worked in that party and sat in its councils. I am no insurgent. I took upon me the obligations of a member of this body before those unofficial gentlemen met in Chicago; and my obligations are not changed since the day I took them upon me. We are acting here responsibly, and if we create such a juggernaut as is wrapped up in the terms of this bill and start it out coursing among the people without rudder or guide, crushing out their lives and their hopes under the pretense that it is going to be their ark of safety, I will allow the responsibility to rest upon other shoulders than mine.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent to have the bill with the amendments thus far adopted printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAGE in the chair). The Senator from Montana asks unanimous consent that the bill as thus far amended may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Montana yield for a question relating to this bill?

Mr. CARTER. I would be glad to yield, but I preferred a request which I desire to have acted upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is the request?

Mr. CARTER. That the bill as thus far amended be printed in the RECORD—not the amendments pending, but the amendments agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none, and it is agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. I could not hear what the request was.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator from Montana requested unanimous consent that the bill with the amendments thus far adopted be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the request has been granted.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I have two purposes in asking for unanimous consent, and I thank the Senate for having acceded to it. First, there is a demand for information as to the progress of the bill from day to day, and this can be most conveniently given through the RECORD. I have another purpose, and that is to have the print of the bill follow the speech of the Senator from Idaho; and I assert that this bill which will be printed in the RECORD is the one pending, and not the bill to which the Senator from Idaho has addressed his remarks. I hope the Senator will take occasion to edit the manuscript, because he will find, if he compares the statements made with the text of the bill, that the statements do not correctly represent the measure that is pending in any substantial particular.

Mr. HEYBURN. I shall not edit the manuscript. The remarks I presented were directed against the bill pending and the principles involved in it. I criticised it in comparison with the bill presented by the same committee a year or more ago; but I think I know to what I directed my remarks, and they will stand in the RECORD, as my remarks have always stood since I have been a member of this body.

The bill as amended is as follows:

A bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That there be, and is hereby, established a system of postal savings depositories under the supervision and direction of a board of trustees, which board shall consist of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Postmaster-General, and the Attorney-General, acting ex officio. All regulations for the receipt, transmission, custody, investment, and repayment of moneys deposited at postal savings depositories shall be prescribed by said board of trustees, and any general regulation prescribed by the Postmaster-General under authority of this act shall be subject to the approval of said board. Said board shall report to Congress at the beginning of each regular session their transactions under the provisions of this act, including a statement showing the number of post-offices receiving deposits of postal savings in each State and Territory, the aggregate amount of deposits made therein, the aggregate of withdrawals therefrom, the amount of interest paid to depositors, and the amount of extra expense incident to the system of postal savings, and all other facts and recommendations which they may deem pertinent and proper to present.

SEC. 2. That every post-office within the United States which is authorized to issue money orders, and such others as the Postmaster-General in his discretion may from time to time designate, are hereby declared to be postal savings depository offices to receive deposits from the public and to account for and dispose of the same according to this act. Every postal savings depository office shall be kept open for the transaction of business every day (Sundays and legal holidays excepted) during the usual post-office business hours of the town or locality where such depository is located, and between such additional specific hours as the Postmaster-General may direct: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, if he deems it necessary or more practical, establish at first postal savings depositories only at the money-order offices of the first, second, and third classes, and thereafter extend the system as rapidly as practicable to all other post-offices specified above.

SEC. 3. That accounts may be opened and deposits made in any postal savings depository established under this act by any person of the age of 10 years or over, in his or her own name, and by a married woman in her own name and free from any control or interference by her husband; but no person shall simultaneously have more than one postal savings account.

SEC. 4. That the postmaster at a postal savings depository shall, upon the making of an application to open an account under this act and the submission of an initial deposit, deliver to the depositor a pass book upon which shall be written the name and signature or mark of the depositor and such other memoranda as may be necessary for purposes of identification, in which pass book entries of all deposits shall be made: Provided, That the Postmaster-General may, with the approval of the board of trustees, adopt some other device in lieu of a pass book as a means of making and preserving evidence of deposits.

SEC. 5. That at least $1, or a larger amount in multiples thereof, must be deposited before an account is opened with the person depositing the same, and $1, or multiples thereof, may be deposited after such account has been opened, but no one shall be permitted to deposit more than $100 in any one calendar month: Provided, That in order that smaller amounts may be accumulated for deposit any person may purchase from any depository office for 10 cents a postal savings card to which may be attached specially prepared adhesive stamps, to be known as "postal savings stamps," and when the stamps so attached amount to $1, or a larger sum in multiples thereof, including the 10-cent postal savings card, the same may be presented as a deposit for opening an account, and additions may be made to any account by means of such card and stamps in amounts of $1 or multiples thereof, and when a card and stamps thereto attached are redeemed by any postmaster he shall immediately cancel the same. It is hereby made the duty of the Postmaster-General to prepare such postal savings cards and postal savings stamps of denominations of 10 cents, and to keep them on sale at every postal savings depository office, and to prescribe all necessary rules and regulations for the issue, sale, and cancellation thereof.

SEC. 6. That interest at the rate of 2 per cent per annum shall be allowed and entered to the credit of each depositor once in each year, the same to be computed on such basis and under such rules and regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe; but interest shall not be computed or allowed on any amount less than $1, or some multiple thereof: Provided, That the balance to the credit of any one person shall never be allowed to exceed $500, exclusive of accumulated interest.

SEC. 7. That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe. Withdrawals shall be paid from the deposits in the State or Territory, so far as the postal funds on deposit in such State or Territory may be sufficient for the purpose, and, so far as practicable, from the deposits in the community in which the depositor withdrawing resides. No bank in which postal savings funds shall be deposited shall receive any exchange or other fees or compensation on account of the cashing or collection of any checks or the performance of any other service in connection with the postal savings depository system.

SEC. 8. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination, and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories. If there is more than one such bank in any city, town, or village willing to take such deposits upon the terms provided for herein, the same shall be divided among them substantially according to their capital and surplus. If no one of such banks in any such city, town, or village is willing to accept the deposits upon such terms, or if there be no bank or banks therein, or if the post-office at which the funds are received is not in a city, town, or village, then the deposits shall be made in a solvent bank or banks, subject to such supervision and examination, of the State or Territory in which the post-office is situated, giving preference to those that are in the same general community as the post-office receiving the funds. The board of trustees shall take from such bank or banks such indemnity bonds as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt repayment of such deposits on demand. At its option any bank may deposit collateral security in lieu of an indemnity bond, such collateral to be subject to the approval of said board. If such bank or banks refuse to receive such deposits on the terms prescribed, said funds may be deposited with the Treasurer of the United States, who shall be the treasurer of said board, and may be withdrawn from deposit upon their order for the repayment of postal savings depositors, or for investment in bonds or other securities of the United States, or in bonds or other securities in which investment of the funds of savings banks is authorized by the law of the State or Territory in which such deposits are received: Provided, That money deposited in the banks and secured to the satisfaction of the board of trustees, as herein provided, shall only be withdrawn to pay the depositors and other obligations of the Government under this act, and shall not be withdrawn for investment so long as the banks are willing to retain it and pay the rate of interest prescribed, from time to time, by said board, which rate shall not be less than 2½ per cent per annum: Provided, That postal savings funds deposited in any State or Territory in which no provision is made by law governing the investment of savings-bank funds may be invested in the same character of securities in such State or Territory as are made the subject of investment of savings-bank funds by the laws of the States of New York or California. Interest and profits accruing from the deposit or investment of postal savings funds shall be applied to the payment of expenses of administration authorized by the board of trustees and approved by the Postmaster-General and of interest due to postal savings depositors as hereinbefore provided, and the excess thereof, if any, shall be covered into the Treasury as part of the postal revenues: Provided, That in the Treasury or with the Treasurer of the United States postal savings funds shall be subject to disposition as provided in this act and not otherwise. For the purposes of this act the word "Territory," as used herein, shall be held to include the District of Columbia, the district of Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Panama Canal Zone.

SEC. 9. That postal savings depository funds shall be kept separate from other funds by postmasters and other officers and employees of the postal service, who shall be held to the same accountability under their bonds for such funds as for public moneys; and no person connected with the Post-Office Department shall disclose to any person other than the depositor the amount of any deposit, unless directed so to do by the Postmaster-General. All statutes relating to the safe-keeping of and proper accounting for public moneys are made applicable to such funds, and the Postmaster-General may require postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at postal savings depositories to give any additional bond he may deem necessary.

SEC. 10. That additional compensation shall be allowed postmasters at post-offices of the fourth class for the transaction of postal savings depository business. Such compensation shall be at not to exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent on the average sum upon which interest is paid each calendar year on receipts at such post-office, and shall be paid from the postal revenues; but postmasters, assistant postmasters, and clerks at post-offices of the presidential grade shall not receive any additional compensation for such service.

SEC. 11. That the sum of $100,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to enable the Postmaster-General and the board of trustees to establish a system of postal savings depositories in accordance with the provisions of this act; and the Postmaster-General is authorized to require postmasters and other postal officers and employees to transact, in connection with their other duties, such postal savings depository business as may be necessary; and he is also authorized to make, and with the approval of the board of trustees to promulgate, and from time to time to modify or revoke, such rules and regulations not in conflict with law as he may deem necessary to carry the provisions of this act into effect.

SEC. 12. That postal savings depository funds are hereby declared to be entitled to all the safeguards provided by law for the protection of public moneys, and all statutes relating to the embezzlement, conversion, improper handling, retention, use, or disposal of postal and money-order funds and the punishment provided for such offenses are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings depository funds, and all statutes relating to false returns of postal and money-order business, the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, improper use, or handling of postal and money-order blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor, with the penalties provided in such statutes, are hereby extended and made applicable to postal savings depository business, and the forgery, counterfeiting, alteration, improper use or handling of postal savings depository blanks, forms, vouchers, accounts, and records, and the dies, plates, and engravings therefor.

SEC. 13. That this act shall take effect on the first day of the third calendar month after its approval.

Mr. BULKELEY. I ask leave to present a proposed amendment to the bill, which I ask to have read and lie on the table.

The amendment was read and ordered to lie on the table, as follows:

At close of section 8 insert:

"Provided, That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act, except reserve funds, shall be invested as soon as practicable in the bonds or securities of the United States bearing a rate of interest not exceeding 3 per cent per annum; and

"Provided further, That said board of trustees may retain on deposit in any solvent bank or banks, as provided in this section, a reserve fund equal to 20 per cent of the aggregate amount of such postal savings deposit."

STEAMERS "A. B. WOLVIN" AND "CAMBRIA."

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I desire to prefer a request for the present consideration of the bill (S. 5697) to authorize the change of name of the steamers A. B. Wolvin and Cambria, owned by the Port Huron and Duluth Steamship Company. The bill comes from the Committee on Commerce with a favorable report. It also has the indorsement of the Secretary of Commerce and Labor, and I hope there will be no objection to its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. 18282) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1910, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. HALE. I move that the Senate insist on its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House, the conferees to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. CLAY the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. KEAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce with an amendment, in section 2, page 4, line 9, after the word "Oregon," to insert the following proviso:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed as in any way affecting the action heretofore taken by the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of section 253 of the Revised Statutes in discontinuing Port Orford, Gardiner, Ellensburg, and Newport as ports of delivery, nor as requiring customs officers to be stationed at such places.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After seven minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

R. 15384) making appropriation for the support of the army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1911, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WARREN. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, grant the request of the House for a conference, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. WARREN, Mr. BULKELEY, and Mr. OVERMAN the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 4, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Prayer by Rev. John Van Schaick, as follows:

Almighty God, our heavenly Father, we invoke Thy blessing upon this Government, and especially upon this House, charged with heavy responsibility. In time of sorrow and in joy, may we realize that Thou dost rule and overrule, that Thou art the lord of our lives, the disposer of our lot.

Face to face with the death of a Member of this body, help us to lift ourselves above the shadows of earth into the light of Thy countenance, into the comfort of Thy presence. Let Thy blessing be with all who mourn. Help us all to be grateful for a life full of years and of service, and more and more strive to do and to bear Thy blessed, holy will. So may Thy kingdom come and Thy holy will be done on earth as it is in heaven. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, involving the privileges of the House, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 369.

Whereas the speech of the Hon. RUFUS HARDY, printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 2, 1910, and delivered in the House on January 28, 1910, and purporting to print a speech delivered by him on October 18, 1909, at Cameron, Tex., contains language improper and in violation of the rules and the privilege of debate, in that it contains criticism of the proceedings in the Senate and the action of a Senator, who is specified by name: Be it

Resolved, That this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report in ten days what action shall be taken.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of that resolution. I deem it unnecessary now to enter into a discussion of the matters to which it refers. Certainly no Member will have any objection to the reference of this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee will fully investigate it. I have no doubt myself that the speech is subject to be expunged from the RECORD, that it is clearly in the face of all the precedents of this House and of the Senate as well, and would lead to interminable trouble if allowed to stay in the RECORD. It would necessarily involve an answer by Senator BAILEY, and that brings the reason of the rule. I will read briefly from Hinds's Precedents, volume 5, page 74:

The Speaker [Mr. Reed], in ruling, quoted the provisions of Jefferson's Manual, and said:

"If the Chair understood the remarks of the gentleman from Maine, they were, in addition to the reading of matters in the RECORD, criticisms with regard to the personal action of Members of the other House and in regard to their votes. * * * The thing to be kept in mind by the House and by gentlemen in addressing this body, not for our own sakes particularly, but for the sake of orderly proceedings in public bodies, is that principle which is laid down in this manual—the principle that there should be in such bodies no such criticism or reference to the Members of another and a coordinate body as would be liable to lead to recriminations or disputes.

"The reason for this is simple and plain on reflection. It is that all legislation, in order to become law, must receive the sanction of both Houses. Anything, therefore, which means misunderstanding between the two Houses—like criticism of the person or manner by the Members of either branch of those of the other—would be likely to create friction and have a very bad effect upon public legislation. At least, that is the theory on which the rule and the construction of the rule to which attention is called is based. And I think everybody will see the soundness and wisdom of it.

"The Chair has the impression that the rule certainly goes as far as stated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, a former Speaker of this House [Mr. Grow], and possibly it goes even further, under the usages of the House. So far as my personal recollection is concerned, my impression is that allusion to the acts, and especially to the motives, of Members or the criticism of Members of the other House is not permissable here, nor is a criticism of us permitted over there, and the purpose of it is that we may avoid unnecessary ill feeling between the two bodies, in the interest of the country and the advancement of legislation. Because, where criticism is made of a man where he can not reply, it is more irritating than criticism of a man where he can reply. And so the motive for establishing a proper rule to govern our relations with the other body is even stronger than it is for establishing proper relations among ourselves. Now, I have no doubt that the gentleman from Maine will proceed in order. But I think that the remark which came to the attention of the Chair was not strictly in order."

Now, sir, this rule is based upon the general assumption that Members of the other body and of this body must not mention, especially adversely, what is going on in the other body, because it is obvious that a Member of either body can not speak in the other body, and if he thinks what was said calls for answer, then he makes answer in the body of which he is a Member, and then the other man replies, and so leads on to interminable confusion.

I do not care to discuss this at length now; I think it ought to be referred to the Judiciary Committee. I think we have been too lax with reference to what the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains, and now is a good time to refer this to that committee and have a report upon which we can all stand. I move the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I will yield to my colleague five minutes.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I am surely not desirous of opposing the reference of this matter to the Judiciary Committee, if the gentleman could point out one single syllable that reflects on a Senator or the senatorial body. I exercised the greatest care to eliminate from the Cameron speech, which, by unanimous consent, was permitted to be incorporated in the RECORD—I exercised the greatest care to eliminate anything that contained or might seem to contain a personal criticism of the motive or person of any Member of the Senate or of the House.

I did in the Cameron speech, as is customary in making speeches to the people at home, refer by name to certain Members; not only members of the Senate, but Members of the House. I spoke of my colleague [Mr. HENRY], giving him his familiar name, by which he is known at home—BOB HENRY.

I spoke of the Speaker, Mr. CANNON. It was known to be a speech made at home, when unanimous consent was given to put it in the RECORD, and everybody knows that in our speeches at home we call Senators by their names. It seems to me before the adoption of a resolution of this kind the gentleman offering it ought to point out something that reflects upon or criticises some Senator or some Member of the House. I edited that speech, and perhaps did not do as the permission required me to do in incorporating the speech in the RECORD as it had been published, because I eliminated three paragraphs, equaling perhaps half a page, in order to obviate any criticism whatever.

I am free to admit that the speech at Cameron is subject to the usual exception that Members of the Senate and the House must be referred to by their titles and States rather than by their names, but it was a speech made at home. I want to say further that I do not know of any reason, except the precedents and practice of the House, which makes it improper to speak of a Member of the House by name, as is frequently done, or of a member of the Senate, in referring to arguments made by them at a former session. The impropriety of discussing arguments made in the other body at this session is based or put upon the ground that it might have a tendency to influence the action of this body by referring to that body. The comments I made in the Cameron speech are upon arguments made by a member of another body, both at home in Texas and in the Senate, and giving a line up of the contention and the argument of a Senator on a public question, his statements outside the Senate and in the Senate at a session already gone, and it is as customary as it is for the days to come around to refer to arguments made in past sessions of either House or Senate in order to criticise and reply to those arguments. If this House be so shut up that its Members are not allowed to reply to arguments made somewhere else, even though they be made in the sacred precincts of the hall of another body, then the rule is better—as it has certainly been oftener—honored in the breach than in the observance.

I admit that no personal criticism or reflection ought to be made in this House upon the membership of the other House, or of this House, but this House ought to be chary, it seems to me, of going far enough to give the resolution dignity by referring it to the Judiciary Committee before the gentleman presenting it finds some paragraph or syllable that does reflect or criticise the motives of any Senator or Congressman. That seems to me to be reasonable. I know that every day we refer to "Senator LODGE" or "Senator SMITH" or "Senator ALDRICH" and others, and if it was intended to use it in the nature of a reflection or criticism, then the rule applies. If this be a rule, it is violated oftener than it is observed and no attention is called to it, even when an argument is made replying to an argument in the other body at the same session. I submit that before reference some paragraph ought to be pointed out in the speech published which does reflect or criticise the motive of a member of the other body. Every precedent the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BURGESS] has read was in a case where it was claimed there was a reflection or personal criticism involved. If we make a new precedent and establish the rule that a Member of the House can not quote an argument or statement of a member of the Senate and refute, we will be guilty of a folly and offense against common sense.

And I wish to say further, of course I could obviate the objection that the name is used and could make another speech if that were desirable, in which I could go on and obviate that technical rule of the House, but it seems to me that common sense does not require it.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for just a moment? I want to ask one question here before the gentleman proceeds with his argument, not intending to discuss the merits of the resolution, but to ask the gentleman from Texas a question. And in order that it may be more intelligible, I will read part of the resolution. First, it reads:

Be it resolved, That a committee of five Members be appointed to consider the remarks aforesaid and report to the House within ten days what action, if any, should be taken.

A part of the language is stricken out, commencing with the word "committee," as it was in typewritten form, and the following language is inserted in pencil:

Be it resolved, That this resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary with instructions to report within ten days what action should be taken.

The question I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas is why that change was made from referring the resolution to a select committee, as was done in the Willett case, and reference made to the Judiciary Committee? Not that there is any objection by me, and I make no question about the propriety of its reference.

Mr. BURGESS. Because it was thought by those who framed it that that was the highest committee in power, influence, and judgment in the House, and we desired this matter to be submitted to the best committee we could pick out.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Of course that disarms me; and being a member of that committee, I will gracefully submit.

Mr. BURGESS. Now, Mr. Speaker, with reference to bringing the speech within the rule, I will say briefly this: In that speech the gentleman from Texas quotes by name from what the Senator said in the Senate of the United States. That is one thing that brings it within the rule, and it could not have been done on this floor if anybody had objected at the time he was making his speech. All the way through the speech he refers to what occurred in the Senate, that Senator ALDRICH said this and Senator BAILEY said that, and it is a discussion in which you could not pick out what the gentleman said about the Senate without taking the whole gist of the speech out. Now, he seems to think that the rule would permit him to name a Senator and quote language from him. That is not true. The rule positively prohibits that, and in connection with that I read directly from a case in point. I read from Hinds's Parliamentary Precedents, volume 5, page 74:

On May 4, 1896, Mr. Charles A. Boutelle, of Maine, called up the naval appropriation bill, which had been returned from the Senate with amendments, and proceeded to quote the utterances of certain Senators in the Senate, and to say that if it were parliamentary he might contrast these with the votes of the same Senators, which he proceeded to specify. Mr. Lemuel E. Quigg, of New York, made the point of order that the gentleman's remarks were obnoxious to the rule.

During the debate Mr. Galusha A. Grow, of Pennsylvania, said:

"Mr. Speaker, if I am correct in my view, the Members of one House can not refer to proceedings pending between the two Houses in a way of comment. Proceedings, however, of either House as printed in the RECORD become history, and any Member may refer to them as history, but without commenting upon them, or discussing the reasons why a Member of the other body uttered certain sentiments at one time and certain other sentiments at another. The RECORD is history, and may be referred to; but comments upon it are, I think, excluded by parliamentary law."

The Speaker in ruling quoted the provisions of Jefferson's Manual, and then proceeded with the quotation which I have already read, showing that it is impossible in this House, unless you will change the rule, to allude to what has occurred in the other House, for you will provoke recrimination and——

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BURGESS. In just a moment; then I will. Now, the gentleman's speech in the RECORD is such an argument that if it stands, then Senator BAILEY will reply in the Senate, and that brings up the reason for the rule. You can not do that which provokes a reply in the Senate, for the rule is that a Member of the House must proceed in order, and you can not by any inference or otherwise provoke recrimination in the Senate, and that is exactly what this speech does. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HARDY. Does the gentleman understand the distinction between crimination and recrimination and argument and reply?

Mr. BURGESS. Why, I think so.

Mr. HARDY. Can the gentleman find anything in the speech to which he refers that reflects upon the motive or purpose or is at all a criticism of the motive or purpose of a Senator or that is anything except a reply to an argument?

Mr. BURGESS. Then you take the position that a Member of the House can have an argument with a Senator about any matter; that you can quote what he says in his speech, and he can reply to that speech ad libitum?

Mr. HARDY. I take the position that time out of mind Members of this body have quoted arguments made by Senators in the other body without objection and replied to them——

Mr. BURGESS. That is true.

Mr. HARDY (continuing). And every day we find it——

Mr. BURGESS. That is true.

But he can not do it. It is unparliamentary to do it. You can not quote a Senator in this House, you can not quote an argument he makes, you can not quote anything he says in the Senate, in this House, in the face of a specific rule.

Mr. HARDY. I will state that so far as that question is concerned, the permission to incorporate was given with the full knowledge, I presume, of every Member here of what was in the speech.

Mr. BURGESS. I beg the gentleman not to take that position, because that would be screening him behind a technicality.

Mr. HARDY. I do not propose to screen myself if this speech is subject to the rule, one particle, but I do not think the gentleman will find one single illustration or example where any speech was ever sought to be expunged that did not involve a reflection, that was simply answer to an argument.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAW. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that Friday, February 11, be substituted for this day for the consideration of business on the Private Calendar reported from the Committee on War Claims, to be taken up immediately after the disposal of business reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. LAW] asks unanimous consent that Friday, a week from to-day, be substituted for to-day for business from the Committee on War Claims in order under the rule, immediately after business is concluded on that day which is in order and reported by the Committee on Invalid Pensions and the Committee on Pensions. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I believe the gentleman would have——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAW] yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. LAW. I do.

Mr. MANN. Under the rule the gentleman's committee would have two weeks from to-day anyway, as I understand it.

Mr. LAW. I think the gentleman from Illinois is in error about that. The Committee on Claims had two weeks ago to-day. This is our regular day. Two weeks from to-day would be the day for the Committee on Claims.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is in error about that. The next day that is taken up on claims will be given to the War Claims Committee, regardless of when it comes. In other words, the first day on claims goes to the Committee on Claims. The next Friday that is devoted to claims business goes to the Committee on War Claims. So the gentleman's committee would not lose anything except a week's time, and for that reason I object.

THE LATE HON. WILLIAM C. LOVERING.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, it is my painful duty to announce to the House the death this morning of Hon. WILLIAM C. LOVERING, a Member from the State of Massachusetts. Thus endeth a long life full of public honors. He carried with him the affection of a host of friends and left a name universally honored and respected.

At some later date we shall ask that a day be set aside for the paying of proper tribute to his memory.

I now offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT] offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 370.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. WILLIAM C. LOVERING, a Representative from the State of Massachusetts.

Resolved, That a committee of 15 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Speaker be allowed to appoint this committee after adjournment, inasmuch as the House will adjourn until Monday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the Speaker be allowed to appoint this committee after adjournment and hand the names to the Journal clerk, with authority that the clerk journalize the same. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

The SPEAKER subsequently announced the appointment of the following committee:

Mr. MCCALL, Mr. LAWRENCE, Mr. GREENE, Mr. WASHBURN, Mr. KELIHER, Mr. PETERS, Mr. BOUTELL, Mr. FOSTER of Vermont, Mr. MCCREARY, Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia, Mr. KENDALL, Mr. LEE, Mr. HENRY W. PALMER, Mr. CALDERHEAD, and Mr. SIMS.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect the House do now adjourn.

The resolution was agreed to.

ADJOURNMENT.

PINE RIDGE INDIAN RESERVATION LANDS.

The bill (S. 2341) to authorize the sale and disposition of a portion of the surplus and unallotted lands in the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, in the State of South Dakota, and making appropriation and provision to carry the same into effect, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs with amendments.

Mr. GAMBLE. There is an error in the print of the bill. The word "Washington," in line 6, page 2, should read "west" instead of "Washington;" and the same amendment should apply to the word "Washington," in line 7, on the same page.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, those amendments will be made. The amendments of the committee will be stated in their order.

The first amendment was, in section 1, page 2, line 5, after the word "the," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "range line between ranges 42 and 43" and insert "fifth guide meridian, west;" and in line 7, after the word "said," to strike out "range line" and insert "fifth guide meridian, west," so as to read:

That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, as hereinafter provided, to sell and dispose of all that portion of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation in the State of South Dakota lying and being within the following-described boundaries, to wit: Commencing at a point on the eastern boundary line of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation where the township line between townships 39 and 40 intersect the same; thence south on said boundary line to a point where the same intersects the boundary line between the States of South Dakota and Nebraska; thence west on the said state line to a point where the same intersects the fifth guide meridian, west; thence north on said fifth guide meridian, west, to a point where the same intersects the township line between townships 39 and 40; thence east of said township line to the point of beginning, except such portions thereof as have been allotted to Indians.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 3, page 4, line 16, after the word "the," to strike out "Indian Bureau" and insert "Indian Department;" in line 22, before the word "as," to insert "to select such clerks and assistants at such compensation;" in line 26, after the word "within," to strike out "each" and insert "that portion of said;" on page 5, line 1, after the word "reservation," to strike out "as;" in line 6, after the word "mineral," to insert "and timber;" at the beginning of line 7 to insert "Provided, That the timber lands shall be classified without regard to acreage; And provided further, That all land classified as timber lands shall be reserved for the use of the Pine Ridge Indians;" and in line 13, after the word "expenses," to insert "exclusive of subsistence," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 3. That the price of said lands entered as homesteads under the provisions of this act shall be fixed by appraisement as herein provided. The President of the United States shall appoint a commission to consist of three persons, to inspect, appraise, and value all of said lands that shall not have been allotted in severalty to said Indians, or reserved by the Secretary of the Interior, or otherwise disposed of, and excepting sections 16 and 36 in each of said townships, said commission to be constituted as follows: One resident citizen of the State of South Dakota, one representative of the Interior Department, and one person holding tribal relations with said tribe of Indians. That within twenty days after their appointment the said commissioners shall meet and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. The said commission is hereby empowered to select such clerks and assistants at such compensation as the Secretary of the Interior may approve. The said commissioners shall then proceed to personally inspect, classify, and appraise, in 160-acre tracts each, all of the remaining lands embraced within that portion of said reservation described in section 1 of this act. In making such classification and appraisement said lands shall be divided into the following classes: First, agricultural land of the first class; second, agricultural land of the second class; third, grazing land; fourth, timber land; fifth, mineral land, if any; the mineral and timber land not to be appraised: Provided, That the timber lands shall be classified without regard to acreage: And provided further, That all land classified as timber lands shall be reserved for the use of the Pine Ridge Indians. That said commissioners shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each while actually employed in the inspection and classification of said lands, and necessary expenses, exclusive of subsistence, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior; such inspection and classification to be completed within six months from the date of organization of said commission. That when said commission shall have completed the classification and appraisement of all of said lands the same shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 4, page 7, line 4, after the word "prescribe," to insert "and patents therefor shall be issued to the purchasers," so as to read:

And provided further, That any lands remaining unsold after said lands have been open to entry for seven years may be sold to the highest bidder for cash, without regard to the prescribed price thereof fixed under the provisions of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and patents therefor shall be issued to the purchasers.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 5, page 7, line 12, after the word "Statutes," to insert "and he is hereby authorized to set apart and reserve for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 10 acres in any town site, and to issue patents for such reserved tracts to the municipality legally charged with the care and custody of lands donated for such purposes. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause not more than 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in aiding the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements in the town sites in which such lots are located;" and in line 23, after the word "lands," to insert "less the amount set aside to aid in the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to reserve from said lands such tracts for town-site purposes as in his opinion may be required for the future public interests, and he may cause the same to be surveyed into blocks and lots and disposed of under such regulations as he may prescribe, in accordance with section 2381 of the United States Revised Statutes; and he is hereby authorized to set apart and reserve for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 10 acres in any town site, and to issue patents for such reserved tracts to the municipality legally charged with the care and custody of lands donated for such purposes. And the Secretary of the Interior shall cause not more than 20 per cent of the net proceeds arising from such sales to be set apart and expended under his direction in aiding the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements in the town sites in which such lots are located. The net proceeds derived from the sale of such lands, less the amount set aside to aid in the construction of schoolhouses or other buildings or improvements, shall be credited to the Indians as hereinafter provided.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 7, page 8, line 18, after the word "at," to strike out "one dollar and twenty-five" and insert "two dollars and fifty;" on page 9, line 1, after the word "not," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "occupied" and insert "otherwise appropriated;" and at the end of the section to insert "Provided further, That in any event not more than two sections shall be granted to the State in any one township, and lands must be selected in lieu of sections 16 or 36, or any part thereof, within the township in which the loss occurs," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 7. That sections 16 and 36 of the land in each township within the tract described in section 1 of this act shall not be subject to entry, but shall be reserved for the use of the common schools and paid for by the United States at $2.50 per acre, and the same are hereby granted to the State of South Dakota for such purpose; and in case any of said sections or parts thereof are lost to said State by reason of allotments thereof to any Indian or Indians, or otherwise, the governor of said State, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, is hereby authorized, within the area described in section 1 of this act, to locate other lands not otherwise appropriated, not exceeding 2 sections in any one township, which shall be paid for by the United States as herein provided, in quantity equal to the loss, and such selections shall be made prior to the opening of such lands to settlement: Provided further, That in any event not more than 2 sections shall be granted to the State in any one township, and lands must be selected in lieu of sections 16 or 36, or any part thereof, within the township in which the loss occurs.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in section 8, page 9, line 12, after the word "of," to strike out "sixty-five" and insert "one hundred and twenty-five;" and in line 16, after the word "of," to strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-five," so as to make the section read:

SEC. 8. That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $125,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, to pay for the lands granted to the State of South Dakota, as provided in section 7 of this act. And there is hereby appropriated the further sum of $35,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of making the appraisement and classification and allotments provided for herein: Provided, That the latter appropriation, or any further appropriation hereafter made for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act, shall be reimbursed to the United States from the proceeds received from the sale of the lands described herein or from any money in the Treasury belonging to said Indian tribe.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, to insert the following new section:

SEC. 10. That the lands allotted, those retained or reserved, and the surplus lands sold, set aside for town-site purposes, or granted to the State, or otherwise disposed of, shall be subject for a period of twenty-five years to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of intoxicants into the Indian country.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask if all those amendments which have been submitted and agreed to are in print?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. They are printed in the report and are committee amendments, save one, where the word "Washington" was changed to the word "west."

Mr. BACON. Has the bill been printed as it will be when amended?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. BACON. The bill itself?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It has.

Mr. BACON. It is an impossibility, of course, for us to know anything in this way about a bill of this magnitude and importance, with the vast number of amendments. I was about to suggest, if the amendments have not already been printed, that we have the bill printed as amended, so that we might see it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It was printed in the form in which it has now been read, including the amendments. The Secretary advises the Chair that it has been on the calendar since January 17 in the form in which it has now been agreed to.

Mr. BACON. I am not familiar with these matters. Evidently it relates to a very wide subject and embraces a very large amount of value. How far the interests of the Government may be affected by it, it is an impossibility for us to know just from the reading of the amendments. It is the fault of Senators that they have not heretofore informed themselves, I admit, but it is not a wise thing to pass the measure in this manner. I should like very much if the Senator from South Dakota would give us some idea of the scope and purpose of the bill.

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, this bill was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs on the 17th of January last, and the bill with the amendments was printed and the report filed and submitted upon that day.

The bill proposes to open about 790,000 acres of land in the southern part of South Dakota, being the southeastern part of the Pine Ridge Indian Reservation, embracing all the lands within the boundaries of the county of Bennett, recently organized by an act of the legislature of the State. The bill contains the usual provisions in regard to the opening of Indian reservations that have been followed for a number of years in the opening of lands not only in the State of South Dakota, but generally throughout the Northwest. It provides that all allotments shall be made to Indians who are entitled to allotments before the lands are opened to settlement. It also provides for a commission, to be appointed by the President, to appraise and classify the lands, one of the commissioners to represent the Interior Department, another holding tribal relations with the Indian tribe, and a citizen of the State of South Dakota. It also provides the compensation of the commissioners and a time when a report thereof shall be made to the department.

The lands are to be appraised and classified by the commission and a report made to the Secretary of the Interior, which is subject to his approval. When all allotments are completed and the lands ready to be opened, it provides that the President shall issue a proclamation specifying the terms and the conditions, in compliance with the provisions of the bill, that the surplus lands shall be opened to settlement and the manner in which registration and settlement may be made. The entryman, at the time he makes settlement upon the land, must pay one-fifth of the appraised valuation of the lands to be opened and the balance in five equal annual installments. The settlers must possess the qualifications of entrymen under the land laws of the United States. If the settler does not comply with the provisions of the law in regard to the payment, he forfeits his rights, and the lands revert to the Indian tribe. The land so forfeited would again be open to settlement, and the party making the second filing thereon would be obliged to pay, as in the case of the original settler, the price of the land fixed by the appraisement.

The Government simply acts as a trustee in behalf of the Indians to collect and account to them for the amount of money paid by the settlers as consideration for the land. The school lands, being sections 16 and 36 in each township, are granted to the State for the benefit of the common schools in compliance with the act admitting the State into the Union.

I may state further that the bill follows substantially the same lines as the bill affecting the Rosebud Reservation, in the same section of the State, which was under discussion, and which passed the Senate a few days since, and that embraced an area of about 830,000 acres. This embraces about 790,000 acres. That is the total area. Possibly half or more of the area has been or will be taken by Indian allotments. The surplus lands are to be opened for settlement.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. GAMBLE. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If I recollect aright, in the bill which was before the Senate a few days ago, to which the Senator has just alluded, in connection with the subject of the school lands there was a provision by which the State got the benefit of those lands, and as they belong to the Indians and not to the Government there was a provision by which certain other lands were to be substituted at the expense of the United States Government for those lands which were thus disposed of.

Mr. GAMBLE. I may say in reply, Mr. President, referring to the enabling act providing for the admission of North and South Dakota, Montana, and Washington, that sections 16 and 36 in each township were granted to the separate States in each State for the benefit of the common schools; but in the States where there were Indian reservations, it provided that the grant should not take effect until the lands were opened to settlement, or, in other words, became a part of the public domain. By the passage of the bill in question the lands so opened become a part of the public domain and open to settlement, and the grant in the enabling act becomes immediately operative and conveys sections 16 and 36 in each township to the State. That was a contract between the Government and the several States as provided by the act of admission. The State of South Dakota is clearly entitled to the school lands, free from any charge to the State.

Perhaps in explanation of the suggestion of the distinguished Senator from Georgia I might say, as to sections 16 and 36, that on these Indian reservations the Indians are first allotted. They are permitted to make their selections and, as a rule, take the best lands. In many cases sections or parts of sections 16 or 36 in the different townships are taken by the Indians for their allotments. Unless some provision were made for the State to make other selections in lieu of those taken, it will be a loss to the State; and in order to carry out the provisions of the enabling act, the State is authorized, under rules which may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, to select other sections or parts of sections in lieu of those which have been taken by Indian allottees.

An amendment, which was proposed and agreed to, requires the State to make those selections within the particular township in which the loss occurred, so that they can not go on a roving commission and select the best lands upon the reservation. This is regarded as a matter of fairness to the Indians.

Mr. BACON. I suppose it is due to my failure to properly express myself that the Senator has not touched upon the question I asked him about. The question I asked, or rather the statement I made, was that, in the bill which was considered a few days ago, as I understood it, these school lands, as they belong to the Indians, were lands which, when taken by the State, proper compensation had to be made to the Indians therefor; and as I understood in the former bill, and as I suppose in this bill, there was a provision under which certain lands were to be bought by the United States, or procured in some other way, to make substitution for the lands and as compensation thereby to the Indians for the school lands. A large sum of money, if I recollect aright, in the former bill was appropriated for the purpose of purchasing lands, which were to be substituted to the Indians for the lands which were thus allotted as school lands. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GAMBLE. I will say in reply to the Senator that section 7 of the bill grants to the State of South Dakota sections 16 and 36, and the Government pays the Indians $2.50 an acre for those lands that are granted to the State for common-school purposes, as I meant to answer the Senator's inquiry. Largely sections 16 and 36 have not been subject to allotment to the Indians, but in cases where they have been allotted then the State may select other sections.

Mr. BACON. I am not speaking about that at all, and have no reference to that matter.

Mr. GAMBLE. I thought that was the Senator's inquiry.

Mr. BACON. No. If I recollect aright, in the discussion the other day it was developed that as the State received certain parts of the land in these reservations which really belong to the Indians the Government, under the bill, was required to purchase such other lands or pay a price equivalent for certain other lands which were to be substituted for those which were thus taken for school purposes. Am I correct in that?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes. I will read section 7.

Mr. BACON. I hope the Senator will let me ask him the question, because evidently he does not understand me. What was the amount it would cost the Government under the former bill to compensate the Indians for the school lands thus taken for the State? It was several hundred thousand dollars, was it not?

Mr. GAMBLE. I think about $165,000 by the former bill.

Mr. BACON. Of course I did not pretend to be accurate in the amount. There was another bill preceding that, was there not?

Mr. GAMBLE. That was a bill to correct an error. That has no relation to this bill whatever.

Mr. BACON. Very well. It had no provision for the payment of money, then, as in the former bill?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, it had.

Mr. BACON. How much did the two added together make?

Mr. GAMBLE. The Standing Rock and Cheyenne Indian Reservation lands embrace about 3,000,000 acres, including the public lands to be opened to settlers as well as the Indian allotments, and as that bill was reported and passed the Senate we agreed to pay the Indians $2.50 an acre for the school lands.

Mr. BACON. How much did that amount to in that bill?

Mr. GAMBLE. I think about $400,000. The bill went to the House and by an error they passed it at $1.25 an acre. The House a week ago corrected the error they made and amended the act so as to provide for the payment of $2.50 an acre for the land, because they felt the Government was pledged to pay that amount.

Mr. BACON. That amounted to some four hundred and odd thousand dollars, and then $160,000 in the second bill?

Mr. GAMBLE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. Making somewhere between $550,000 and $600,000. The point I am after to which all this leads, though of course those things are passed, is how much in this bill is the amount of money in the same way which is to be paid?

Mr. GAMBLE. One hundred and twenty-five thousand dollars.

Mr. BACON. Making altogether about $700,000 that is to be paid on account of these school lands? I am simply asking for information.

Mr. GAMBLE. I think so.

Mr. BACON. That is what I wanted to get from the beginning.

Mr. GAMBLE. I can refer back to the rule that has been followed in the State of South Dakota in the opening of the Sisseton Reservation, in the year 1892. The Government paid $2.50 an acre directly to the Indians for all the land in the act of opening and donated the school lands to the State.

Mr. BACON. This is practically paid to the State. It is the same thing.

Mr. GAMBLE. It is in conformity to the contract and agreement made between the State and the Federal Government when the State was admitted into the Union. South Dakota as a Territory was powerless. The Indians of the Northwest were removed to and placed within the limits of the Territory, and the people of the Territory had no voice therein. There are practically 20,000 Indians within South Dakota at this time.

As I read to the Senate, by the provisions of the enabling act the Government agreed to give these lands to the State for the benefit of the common schools. This is simply carrying out the provisions of the enabling act.

I may state further that before the admission of the State into the Union, in the opening of the great Sioux Reservation, where something like 9,000,000 acres were opened, the Government paid $1.25 an acre for the school sections and donated them to the State for school purposes. The same thing was done in the opening of the Yankton Reservation, and the same in the opening of Gregory County and Tripp County, and in the Cheyenne and Standing Rock Reservation. It is simply following the rule adopted as to all of the States which were admitted under the same enabling act.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I have had no purpose in the colloquy which I have had with the Senator to offer any amendment or to make any special opposition to his bill. I simply desired that the facts should be clearly stated and that it should be known exactly what is the effect of the bill. Of course the Senate will deal with it as it sees proper.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no further amendments as in Committee of the Whole, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS METHODS COMMISSION.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask leave out of order to report from the Committee on Public Expenditures a bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 6168) creating a government business methods commission.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that the bill may be read.

The bill was read the second time at length, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission is hereby created, to be called the "government business methods commission," to be composed of three members of the Senate, to be appointed by the presiding officer thereof, and three Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker thereof, and three members to be appointed by the President; and any vacancy on the commission shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment.

SEC. 2. That it shall be the duty of this commission to inquire into and report to Congress at the earliest date or dates practicable what changes are necessary or desirable in the methods of transacting the business of the Government or in the laws relating thereto, and for this purpose they are authorized to sit during the sessions or recess of Congress, at such times and places as they may deem desirable, to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to summon and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to employ such secretaries, experts, stenographers, messengers, and other assistants as shall be necessary to carry out the purposes for which said commission was created. The commission shall have the power, through subcommittees or otherwise, to examine witnesses and to make such investigations and examinations of the subjects committed to their charge as they shall deem necessary.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President, I am instructed by a unanimous vote of the Committee on Public Expenditures, at a meeting at which all the members of the committee but two were present, to make this report and to ask for the present consideration of the bill.

Mr. ELKINS. I should like to have it go over, because I do not understand quite whether it ousts the jurisdiction of the Senate committees or not.

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not affect the jurisdiction of any Senate committee.

Mr. ELKINS. I am unwilling to surrender whatever jurisdiction we have over these matters to a committee.

Mr. ALDRICH. It does not affect the question of the jurisdiction of Senate committees at all. If the Senator desires to have the bill read again, he will see that that is perfectly plain.

Mr. ELKINS. Let the bill lie over, Mr. President.

Mr. ALDRICH. Then, I give notice that on Monday I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from West Virginia objects to present consideration, and the bill will be placed on the calendar.

CONFEDERATE VETERANS' REUNION.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents, saddles, and bridles for the use of the confederate veterans' reunion to be held at Mobile, Ala., in April, 1910.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Alabama asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution which he has indicated.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I will not object to this request, but after the joint resolution has been disposed of I shall insist that the regular order shall be proceeded with.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the joint resolution.

The Secretary read the joint resolution.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I object.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The next bill on the calendar will be proceeded with.

ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1630) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River, from Washington to the Arlington estate property, was announced as next in order, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. BORAH. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the report be read, if it is not too long.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the report.

The Secretary read the following report, submitted by Mr. MARTIN January 17, 1910:

The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1630) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

Similar bills were introduced in the Senate during the Fifty-eighth, Fifty-ninth, and Sixtieth Congresses, reported favorably, and passed by the Senate.

The report on Senate bill 1046, Sixtieth Congress, first session, which your committee adopt, was as follows:

"The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1046) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

"Similar bills were introduced in the Senate during the Fifty-eighth and Fifty-ninth Congresses, reported favorably, and passed by the Senate.

"The report on Senate bill 1373, Fifty-ninth Congress, first session, which your committee adopt, was as follows:

"'The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 1373) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

"'A similar bill (S. 820) was introduced in the Senate during the Fifty-eighth Congress, reported favorably, and passed by the Senate.'

"The report was as follows:

"'The Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 820) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.'

"The bill has the approval of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, as will appear by the following letter:"

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, COMMISSIONERS DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Washington, December 7, 1903.

SIR: The commissioners have the honor to recommend favorable action upon Senate bill 820 (58th Cong., 1st sess.), "To provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property," which was referred to them at your instance for their examination and report.

They have for the past three years annually recommended a similar proposition to Congress as a memorial to American patriotism. It has been recommended by the President of the United States, and has the active support of patriotic organizations and citizens all over the United States. During the meeting of the national encampment of the Grand Army of the Republic at Washington from October 5 to 9, 1902, a fine corner stone for the memorial bridge was presented by the Stonecutters' Union of the District of Columbia and accepted by the Secretary of War upon the recommendation of the Grand Army of the Republic.

Very respectfully,

HENRY B. F. MACFARLAND,
President Board of Commissioners
District of Columbia.

Hon. J. H. GALLINGER,
Chairman Committee on District of Columbia,
United States Senate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I inquire what is the status of this bill? Is it here by unanimous consent?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, subject to objection.

Mr. BORAH. I object to its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill will go over.

DESCENDANTS OF THE SIGNERS.

The bill (S. 1425) to incorporate the Descendants of the Signers was announced as next in order.

Mr. HEYBURN. I object to that bill, Mr. President.

Mr. BAILEY. I object to that bill.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it go over under Rule IX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. It will go over——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, let me be sure I understand this bill. As I understand, it is a bill to incorporate the Descendants of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, and is a District of Columbia incorporation.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who reported the bill, I will say that the Senator is right.

Mr. BAILEY. If it were an attempt to create a corporation beyond the District of Columbia I should resist it as wanting in power. It is a proposition to incorporate a kind of inherited glory, which I think a very bad proposition under a government like this; but I am content for the bill to be voted on, though I shall vote against it. I think that those who desire to incorporate the glory of their ancestors lack the true spirit of our institutions.

Mr. HEYBURN. I ask that the bill go over under Rule IX.

Mr. BACON. I want to suggest to the Senator from Idaho, with his permission, that, in the absence of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE], who is in charge of the bill, possibly it would be better to limit his request simply to an objection.

Mr. HEYBURN. I had not observed the absence of the Senator from Connecticut. I shall not insist that the bill go to Rule IX, but simply that it go over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The bill goes over.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

The bill (S. 4462) to amend section 5278 of the Revised Statutes was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Is that the extradition bill?

Mr. PILES. It is.

Mr. KEAN. Let it go over.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I hope that the bill will not go over. I am perfectly willing to submit the matter now to a vote.

Mr. KEAN. I thought, Mr. President, that the aim in all legislation of the present day was to try to secure uniform laws.

Mr. PILES. Practically every State in the West prosecutes by information. This bill simply proposes to carry out the idea that a man may be extradited by information. I do not think, as a matter of law, that right can be denied, anyway; but the decision of the circuit court of appeals for the fourth circuit has put this question in doubt. I therefore move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill at the present time, unless the Senator from New Jersey will withdraw his objection, as I hope he will.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES] to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 4462) to amend section 5278 of the Revised Statutes, the objection of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] to the contrary notwithstanding.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to amend section 5278 of the Revised Statutes so as to read as follows:

SEC. 5278. Whenever the executive authority of any State or Territory demands any person, as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any State or Territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found, an information duly filed, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory, charging the person demanded with having committed treason, felony, or other crime, certified as authentic by the governor or chief magistrate of the State or Territory from whence the person so charged has fled, it shall be the duty of the executive authority of the State or Territory to which such person has fled to cause him to be arrested and secured and to cause notice of the arrest to be given to the executive authority making such demand, or to the agent of such authority appointed to receive the fugitive, and to cause the fugitive to be delivered to such agent when he shall appear. If no such agent appears within six months from the time of the arrest, the prisoner may be discharged. All costs or expenses incurred in the apprehending, securing, and transmitting such fugitive to the State or Territory making such demand shall be paid by such State or Territory.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington explain the bill at some length? I have not the report before me, and I desire to understand just what the bill is. As I understand, there are only a few words added to the present law, and that is on the question of information. I should like to have the Senator from Washington explain the bill.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I will explain the bill to the Senator in a very few moments. The present law provides that a fugitive from justice may be extradited upon the production of "a copy of an indictment found or an affidavit made," and so forth. We seek by this amendment to insert in the statute the words "an information duly filed."

The reason for the proposed amendment to the existing law is this: In the case of Ex parte Hart, reported in Sixty-third Federal Reporter, the circuit court of appeals of the fourth circuit held that one prosecuted by information filed by a prosecuting attorney could not be extradited from one State to another State.

Upon the authority of the Hart case several governors have refused to surrender the alleged fugitive. The former governor of the State of Washington called my attention to this matter a year or so ago. I then presented the question to this body, and a similar bill was passed by the Senate at a former session of Congress.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is that the only change which the amendment makes?

Mr. PILES. That is the only change.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Simply the addition, so that it will include an information as well as an indictment?

Mr. PILES. It simply authorizes the extradition to be on information as well as on indictment or on affidavit before a justice of the peace.

Mr. KEAN. An affidavit before a justice of the peace?

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. That is the law now.

Mr. PILES. The law now authorizes the extradition of an individual upon an indictment found or an affidavit filed with a justice of the peace. I see no reason why a fugitive from justice may not be extradited upon an information duly filed in a court of record.

Mr. BACON. The language of the law is "magistrate;" not "justice of the peace."

Mr. PILES. A magistrate is a justice of the peace.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Washington means to say they are synonymous?

Mr. PILES. I do.

Mr. BACON. But I say the language of the law is "magistrate."

Mr. PILES. Yes; but in law a "magistrate" means a justice of the peace as well as a judge of a higher court when sitting as a committing magistrate.

Mr. BACON. The question which I understood the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] was asking the Senator from Washington was whether there was any other proposed change in the present law.

Mr. PILES. There is none.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. The Senator has not heard the question.

Mr. PILES. Very well.

Mr. BACON. The question is, Is there any other change than the mere insertion of the word "information?" Does the Senator strike out "magistrate" and insert "justice of the peace?"

Mr. PILES. I do not. I simply insert the words "an information duly filed."

Mr. BACON. That is the entire change? It simply inserts the word "information?"

Mr. PILES. Exactly.

Mr. BACON. There is no use of discussing the question of the difference between "magistrate" and "justice of the peace."

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from South Dakota?

Mr. PILES. I do.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That is, the words "or an affidavit made before a magistrate" are in the law now?

Mr. PILES. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And the Senator's amendment simply puts in the four words, "an information duly filed?"

Mr. PILES. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have no objection to that amendment, but I do not recognize the power of Congress to compel the governor of a State to deliver a fugitive.

Mr. PILES. This does not, either.

Mr. BAILEY. The law as it now stands declares that it shall be the duty of the executive of a State, but the Supreme Court decided many years ago in the case of Dennison v. Magoffin, as I remember, that the Congress of the United States could not require a state officer to execute a federal statute. I believe the Supreme Court was right, and if we want a fugitive delivered, and the State does not choose to deliver him a resort to a federal tribunal through federal officers would be the only way to execute that provision of the Constitution. I think one sovereignty has no power over another. I am aware that afterwards, in the Louisiana case, under the stress of what appeared to be a great political emergency, the doctrine of Dennison v. Magoffin was somewhat qualified; but I believe it is the true construction of the Constitution. I simply want to record that as my opinion, and I have no objection to this amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I have scant time to look at a point which suggests itself with regard to this matter—the language "an information duly filed." The word "duly," used in that connection, is often responsible for very serious controversy in the courts. If there was an existing law of the United States regulating the conditions and manner of filing an information, then the word "duly" would refer to that; but in the absence of a sufficient provision or definite provision as to the manner and effect of filing an information, the word "duly" refers to nothing. There should be some elaboration of that statement—"an information duly filed." There should be some statement as to the jurisdiction in which that is to be filed. Is it to be filed in the jurisdiction where the offense is alleged to have been committed, or may it be filed elsewhere, or is it to be filed in the jurisdiction where the party sought to be apprehended is found? The provision here is not sufficiently protected or guarded to justify us in enacting it without something more definite than the words "duly filed."

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will refer to the original statute, he will see that the part of the section to which the pending bill relates has reference altogether to the action taken in the State which is claiming the defendant.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I read from the section as it is proposed to be amended:

> SEC. 5278. Whenever the executive authority of any State or Territory demands any person, as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any State or Territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found, an information duly filed, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory—

And so forth.

That must of necessity refer to the action had in the State and in the jurisdiction which is claiming the person of the defendant. Of course the question of the due filing of information depends entirely upon the provisions of the state statute, which must be shown to the satisfaction of the executive of the State upon whom the requisition is made.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. Under existing law, I ask the Senator what constitutes now the due filing of an information?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There may be different practices in different States. Due filing of an information in my State would be the filing of the information by the prosecuting attorney in the office of the clerk of the court.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then, it is contemplated by this provision that the information shall be filed in the state courts?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Unquestionably.

Mr. HEYBURN. Over which we have no control.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is the only place it can be filed in the State in which I live. The Senator from Montana says in his State it requires the consent of the court before the information can be filed.

Mr. HEYBURN. Of course we have no control, and can exercise none, in legislating as to the manner of filing an information in the state courts. So we can not say here what is a due filing.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is a question between the executive asking for the extradition and the executive upon whom the request is made.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. Then this simply leaves it to be controverted in the jurisdiction where the defendant is found. It leaves the question open to controversy as to whether or not there has been due compliance with the law.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. As all questions of whatever sort are left open to that same authority in extradition proceedings.

Mr. HEYBURN. This does not, then, relate to extradition on behalf of the Government of the United States?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Certainly not.

Mr. HEYBURN. In no sense whatever?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. In no sense whatever.

Mr. HEYBURN. And it has no application to the federal law, except as the constitutional provision in regard to Congress regulating or providing, within the limitations expressed, for the execution of a writ of this kind.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand the Senator is accurate in his statement.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think it should be made very plain that we are not attempting to enact a federal statute for the extradition of federal prisoners or those accused under the federal law.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will call the attention of the Senator to the fact that this bill does not propose a new statute or a new law; it simply enlarges the scope of the present statute so as to include the practice of proceeding against defendants by information in certain jurisdictions.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to have had time to investigate that question in the light of the suggestion from the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, because the general impression in regard to this legislation has been that it was legislation in the interest of the execution of the laws of the United States, and communications have come to the committee having charge of the revision of the laws of the United States in regard to this matter inquiring as to what effect it would have upon existing federal law. If it is true, in the judgment of the Senator in charge of the bill and the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, that we are not legislating at all in regard to offenses against the federal law, then I will be content to leave this to the interpretation that might be placed upon it by the state courts, because the state courts would be the only ones to deal with it; but if this is a question that is to come up before the federal authority in its various branches, then it is a question that we should pause long enough to consider more thoroughly than we are giving it consideration now.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator, if he will permit me for just a moment, that there is no such purpose as that in my mind.

The purpose of the amendment is simply to give the States who prosecute by information the same right to extradite upon an information as they now have upon an affidavit filed before a magistrate or upon an indictment found by a grand jury. It has absolutely no relation to anything else.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. It appears to me, Mr. President, that there is another very serious question involved in the pending bill, and that is, whether the Congress of the United States should undertake to impose upon the governments of the several States—for the language of this bill does undertake to impose upon the governments of the States—the duty of extraditing and sending out of their territory to other and distant States persons charged with crime, without any evidence whatever being produced as to the commission of the crime.

When an indictment is produced as the basis of a demand for the extradition of a person resident in a State, that furnishes the highest evidence that a grand jury, proceeding upon competent testimony, has found a prima facie case of guilt. The indictment is the finding upon sworn evidence. When an affidavit is produced the officer to whom it is presented in the State upon which the demand is made must find within the four corners of the document competent proof of the facts which constitute the offense. That affidavit is a preliminary to a prosecution in accordance with the due and orderly process of law in the State making the demand. But what is an information? It is simply a charge, made, it is true, by a public officer, but made upon no assertion or assumption of any guilt on the part of the defendant; that is to say, it is made upon no evidence of the commission of an offense.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. Will the Senator permit me to finish my very brief statement? Then I will yield.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. ROOT. The charge as it is presented over the signature of a public officer gives no warrant that anyone has given any testimony or can give any testimony to the facts which constitute the offense.

Mr. President, the Constitution of the United States has prescribed the rule for us which we ought to follow. It has declared that—

> No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, etc.

I shall not give my vote to change the laws of the United States in such a way as in terms to undertake to force upon the government of any State a rule regarding the holding of men to responsibility for crime which is directly in contravention of the mandate of our own Constitution and the rule which is prescribed by that Constitution.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me a moment further, I will then yield.

It is no light thing for us to change the law upon which citizens of the United States may be taken from their homes and, against their will, carried thousands of miles away from those communities in which their characters are known for trial upon the charge of an infamous crime. It is not a thing that we ought to do upon a bill without a report from a committee——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. With a reasonable argument in support of the bill. It is not a thing that we ought to do upon any basis other than the sworn evidence of facts which show to the officer upon whom the demand is made that a crime has been committed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BORAH. I thought the Senator had concluded.

Mr. ROOT. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The suggestion of the Senator from New York that an information is filed without any evidence of the commission of a crime is an error, so far as any law I am familiar with in reference to the filing of informations is concerned. The prosecuting officer in my State can not file an information until a preliminary examination has been had, and he can only file an information concerning a crime which is revealed in the hearing to have been committed. Therefore when the prosecuting officer files his information he bases it upon sworn testimony taken before a magistrate, where the defendant appears and is examined and cross-examined, if he desires to be, or where his witnesses are introduced, examined, and cross-examined, and where his attorney is heard. You can not file an information under the law relating to the prosecution of criminals by information until a thorough examination has been had, unless it is waived by the defendant. The courts have held that an information filed and not based upon evidence taken in that way is wholly void, and is not duly filed in any sense of the term whatever.

Now, so far as prosecuting by information is concerned, the Supreme Court of the United States has settled that question. It has held that a prosecution upon information is a full compliance with the provision of the Constitution which has just been read by the Senator from New York, and that it is in every sense a compliance with the provision to which he has called attention. So we give in this case the authority to extradite upon the basis of that which the State deems sufficient upon which to prosecute, and that is the only purpose of this amendment—to extradite upon an information which the Supreme Court has held to be an ample compliance with the right of a party to know the charge before he is proceeded against. As the Senator will remember, in the case of Hertardo v. California, which came up from California, that question was discussed and settled by the Supreme Court. It was held to constitute due process of law.

[Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, it is quite evident from the statement made by the Senator from Arkansas that there are some States where an information may be filed without any formal proceeding. It seems to me that if we were otherwise willing to make this change in regard to the States where an information may be filed only on the basis of sworn testimony, we ought to have furnished to us or have the opportunity to examine ourselves into the laws of all the States which would be affected by this act, and that if there are any States in which, in accordance with the old common-law custom, the prosecuting officer can file an information at his own pleasure when there is nothing but a charge and no evidence, we ought not to pass this bill in its present form, making it so that it will be applicable to those States.

But even as to the States where the statutes require the prosecuting officer to proceed upon the basis of sworn testimony, the objection I have is not fully met. It seems to me that the officer to whom the demand is made ought to have laid before him either the formal finding of the grand jury or the evidence upon which the magistrate or the prosecuting officer, whatever officer he may be, determined that there is evidence of an offense. There is no trouble about extradition. All that is necessary is to produce the affidavits made before the magistrate. What this bill would do would be to make it unnecessary to produce to the officers of the State on which the demand is made that evidence, and permit as a substitute for it the information of a prosecuting officer.

The decisions which hold that the adoption by a State of prosecutions under the laws by information is not obnoxious to any prohibition of the Federal Constitution are not decisions which relate to federal procedure. They leave still standing the provision of the Constitution, binding upon us, upon all federal courts and officers, that no person shall be held to answer for an infamous offense except upon presentment of a grand jury; and there are some States, Mr. President, which still hold to the views of the framers of the Constitution. There are some States which still believe that the grand jury and the requirement of a presentment or indictment by a grand jury constitute a valuable protection to the rights of a citizen.

My objection to this bill is that it is an attempt to deny to those States which still wish to protect their citizens the safeguard of our Constitution and to impose upon all persons acting under federal procedure the obligation to abandon that safeguard in regard to those people dwelling within their borders whose extradition is demanded by other States. I do not think we ought to compel the State of Massachusetts or the State of New York or the State of New Jersey to send people out of their borders without any indictment by a grand jury and without any evidence being laid before the officers of those States that a crime has been committed. We, acting under the Constitution, which requires an indictment by a grand jury, ought not to compel the States which believe that that is a valuable protection to their citizens to abandon it in extradition proceedings.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I think the Senator is right, and I would limit the proposed act to such States as have abolished the grand jury.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, this is not an attempt upon the part of any State to force the governor of another State to surrender a fugitive who has fled from the State in which he is charged with crime. The amendment does not in anywise change the existing law in this respect. The governor of the State in which the fugitive has sought an asylum is not obliged by law to surrender the alleged fugitive, as the Senator from New York well knows. A great many of the Western States, while not abolishing the grand-jury system altogether, prosecute very largely by information filed by the prosecuting attorney. The legality of such prosecutions has been repeatedly sustained by the Supreme Court of the United States.

The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] asks why a citizen of New York or New Jersey should be taken from his home and carried across the country and there prosecuted upon an information. I might answer by asking him: "Why should a citizen of New York who, while in the State, violates the laws of the State of Washington have any greater rights than a citizen of that State?" If the fugitive were arrested while in the State, it must be conceded that he could, under the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, be there prosecuted by information. And no good reason can, in my judgment, be shown why he should not be extradited upon an information for trial in the State whose laws he has violated.

We find prosecutions by information much more expeditious and much more economical than prosecutions by indictment. The prosecuting attorney who informs against accused persons is acting under his oath of office. He is better fitted by training than a magistrate to determine whether or not an accused person should be informed against; also, whether his State should be put to the expense of seeking to extradite one charged with violating the laws of his State. In the twenty years that prosecutions have been carried on in the State of Washington by information I have never heard it charged that the prosecuting attorney had abused the great power vested in him by unjustly, oppressively, or maliciously filing an information against an innocent person.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Has indictment by grand jury been abolished in Washington?

Mr. PILES. It has not. The constitution of the State does not, however, require a preliminary examination before a magistrate as a prerequisite to proceeding by information.

I am not able to agree with the Senator from Idaho that the courts have held that unless there be a preliminary examination the prosecution can not proceed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JONES in the chair). Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I said so far as my State is concerned.

Mr. PILES. I did not catch the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. Our supreme court has held within the last ten days that such an information would be utterly void.

Mr. PILES. That is undoubtedly true under the laws of Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. That is what I said.

Mr. PILES. The Supreme Court in the matter of Strauss (197 U. S., 333), in speaking of extradition on informations, uses this language:

* * * And these preliminary proceedings are not completed until the party is brought before the court in which the trial may be had. Why should the State be put to the expense of a grand jury and an indictment before securing possession of the party to be tried? It may be true, as counsel urge, that persons are sometimes wrongfully extradited, particularly in cases like the present; that a creditor may wantonly swear to an affidavit charging a debtor with obtaining goods under false pretenses. But it is also true that a prosecuting officer may either wantonly or ignorantly file an information charging a like offense. But who would doubt that an information, where that is the statutory pleading for purposes of trial, is sufficient to justify an extradition?

While it is true that the statement of the court in respect to informations was not necessary to a determination of the question at issue in the case it had under consideration, it nevertheless shows that that court did not consider that the rights of an accused person would be violated when extradited upon an information duly filed by a prosecuting officer.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I should like to ask the Senator from Washington if it is not possible to secure the extradition of a criminal who has fled the State of Washington by lodging complaint against him before the committing magistrate and applying for his extradition upon the information and affidavit lodged with the committing magistrate?

Mr. PILES. That is possible. Yes; that may be done.

Mr. CRAWFORD. So that you are not without a remedy in the matter of extradition.

Mr. PILES. Not at all. But we desire to pursue the usual course adopted in the western country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Will the Senator permit another question?

Mr. PILES. Certainly.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Do you not have in your State rules governing extraditions which require that the application shall be accompanied with affidavits setting out in detail the charge?

Mr. PILES. The usual procedure in the State of Washington is this: If one feels that another has committed an offense of which he has knowledge or information, he goes before the prosecuting attorney and makes an affidavit setting forth the facts upon which he bases the accusation. The prosecuting attorney thereupon investigates the charge, and if he finds that a crime has been committed he files an information in the superior court and proceeds against him on the information. If the accused has fled from justice and the prosecutor wishes him returned to the State for trial, he presents the matter to the governor, the same as though an indictment had been returned by a grand jury.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is the certified copy of the information unaccompanied by any corroborating affidavits?

Mr. PILES. I am not sure about that. It may be that the affidavit of the complaining witness accompanies the information.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I think the Senator will find that under the rule which generally prevails in States where indictments are presented, and in States where informations are filed, that they are accompanied with a certified copy of the affidavits corroborative of the charge and going into the details.

Mr. PILES. I understand that the executives of the several States have uniform rules on the subject of extradition.

We have, as I said, been prosecuting by information in Washington for about twenty years. If we can send men to the penitentiary for life, if we can hang them when convicted upon an information, why can we not extradite upon an information duly filed by a prosecuting attorney?

Mr. ROOT. May I ask the Senator from Washington a question?

Mr. PILES. Yes.

Mr. ROOT. You never convicted any man and hanged him or sent him to the state prison for life without evidence, did you?

Mr. PILES. I hardly think we could do that.

Mr. ROOT. My proposition is that you should not be permitted to extradite him without evidence. I am not quarreling with the proceeding by information. I do not know that I would differ with the Senator from Washington as to the expediency of it. That question is not here at all. I do not question at all the right or the propriety or the wisdom of the people of the State of Washington in prosecuting crime by information. But it is possible now for every State to secure the extradition of a prisoner charged with crime from any other State upon the presentation of proof that a crime has been committed, by way of an affidavit before a magistrate or by the presentation of indictment, and the only thing this bill adds to the law is the liberty to take a man from the State in which he resides to another State without any evidence being produced that he has committed an offense.

Mr. PILES. Will the Senator let me ask him a question?

Mr. ROOT. If in States like Idaho the laws require the information to proceed upon sworn testimony, as now under the present law, the production of that sworn testimony is a basis entirely adequate for extradition. It is only in the States where informations can be filed without any sworn testimony, at the will or pleasure of the prosecuting officer, that this bill produces any effect.

Mr. PILES. Let me ask the Senator a question right there.

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. PILES. Is it not a fact under existing law that John Jones may go before a justice of the peace, and upon the filing of an affidavit put in motion the machinery necessary to extradite Peter Smith, for instance? Why should an affidavit filed with a justice of the peace be more effective than one filed with a prosecuting attorney, who is skilled in the law, and who is acting under his oath of office?

Mr. ROOT. Because when John Smith goes before a committing magistrate and makes an affidavit which sets in motion the wheels of the machinery that result in a demand for extradition, the sworn affidavit that he has made goes to the State upon which the demand is made, and before the officer who has the right to make the order of extradition, and he can see in it and say whether the offense charged and the testimony given are sufficient to constitute a proof of the offense.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

Mr. ROOT. One moment. But when a prosecuting officer can file an information, with or without evidence, and upon that information set the wheels in motion, there goes then before the officer of the State on which the demand is made, merely this prosecuting officer's charge—not any proof, but a charge which may have proof behind it or which may not have proof behind it.

Mr. PILES. Will the Senator let me interrupt him right there? The Senator is mistaken. Suppose the State of Washington should seek to extradite an alleged fugitive from justice from the State of New York. The governor of New York would have a perfect right to say to the chief executive of the State of Washington, "Before I will honor your requisition you must furnish me with an affidavit of the complaining witness."

Mr. ROOT. He would do that in plain violation of the terms of this law which you are proposing to pass.

Mr. PILES. I do not agree with the Senator, because the governor upon whom the demand is made has the right to require the submission of such evidence as will satisfy his conscience before yielding to the demand.

Mr. ROOT. Because it is proposed in this law to add to the existing law, which requires in terms extradition upon an indictment and extradition upon an affidavit, the further requirement that extradition shall be made upon the information, without any affidavit and without any indictment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, does the Senator from New York think that the governor upon whom the demand is made would have to honor a requisition by reason of the passage of this statute?

Mr. ROOT. I beg the Senator's pardon; I did not catch his question.

Mr. BORAH. I ask, Does the Senator think that the governor of the State upon which the demand is made would have to recognize the demand? It is in his discretion, whatever this statute may be.

Mr. ROOT. A discretion under which he ought always to demand proof, under the responsibility of an oath that a crime has been committed. What it is proposed that we shall do by this amendment is to say that he shall not exercise any discretion in that way, but he shall extradite without proof.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield further to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. It does not occur to me that that is a fair interpretation of the statute that is proposed to be amended. It simply provides that according to the usual machinery and the usual custom they shall have a right to extradite upon information; but that does not curtail or in any way take away the right of the governor upon whom the demand is made to require anything that he desires before he grants the requisition.

At the present time you may extradite upon the mere affidavit of the party before a magistrate. That would be simply the sworn statement of an individual without any proof or evidence whatever. But there can be no doubt that if the governor was not satisfied with that, he could demand a further showing before he would grant the requisition.

So while in this case it is said that you may extradite upon information, it rests at last with the governor who is to grant the requisition as to whether he is to be satisfied with that or not.

Mr. ROOT. Then, Mr. President, our deliverance is idle. It is bringing the Congress of the United States into contempt by assuming to impose upon the executives of the several States duties which we know they will not perform, and which we feel they ought not to perform.

Mr. SHIVELY. Will the Senator from New York allow me?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. SHIVELY. Then, the virtue of this proposed statute is the fact that it may be ignored.

Mr. ROOT. Precisely; and it is now proposed to add to it something that we all agree ought to be ignored.

Mr. PILES. It may be ignored to-day. The governor is not required to return the man on indictment found.

Mr. ROOT. He may refuse, and for the reason that it may be ignored it is proposed that we should add to it something which we believe ought to be ignored.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. I ask the Senator from New York if he thinks it is within the power of Congress to pass a law which would compel the governor to recognize a requisition?

Mr. ROOT. I do not think there is——

Mr. HEYBURN. Will the Senator permit me to call attention to the real law, which is in the Constitution, and which leaves no option whatever in the governor? I read from it:

> A person charged in any State with treason, felony, or other crime, who shall flee from justice, and be found in another State, shall, on demand of the executive authority of the State from which he fled, be delivered up, to be removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime.

That is all the provision. There is no latitude there for the exercise of discretion.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I would like to extend the inquiry to my colleague. Does he think it is within the power of Congress for us to pass a law which will compel the governor to recognize a requisition?

Mr. HEYBURN. The Constitution compels the governor to recognize a requisition if it comes in the form and manner prescribed by the Constitution.

Mr. BORAH. With all due respect to the Senator from Idaho, I do not think we can pass such a law.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I am not talking about passing a law. The law was passed by the constitutional convention, and we can not affect its provisions by anything we do.

Mr. BORAH. Unfortunately for that position, the Supreme Court of the United States, which is the last tribunal to construe this fundamental charter, has, in my opinion, decided otherwise. It rests at last in the discretion of the governor. We can not compel him to deliver the party. If we could we would have done so in one or two instances.

Mr. SHIVELY. Is it not a fact that the test in such a case is whether the governor could be mandamused to deliver up an alleged fugitive charged? The courts have held that he could not.

Mr. BORAH. It is very well settled, and has been for a number of years.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will offer an amendment in a moment. I want to suggest that perhaps we have found a provision of the Constitution that can not be enforced; but I doubt it. The mere statement that the governor can not be compelled by mandamus to obey the positive injunction of the Constitution is rather a dangerous doctrine. So far as I have taken this matter under consideration, it is not what we may do by legislation that will affect this provision of the Constitution, but it is a question as to what the law is. If we are proposing here to enact a measure that is absolutely in conflict with that provision of the Constitution it is high time we knew it.

Now, pointing the objection which I made to this measure, I propose on line 10, page 1, to strike out the words "duly filed" and to insert in lieu of them the words:

> Made after an examination and the hearing of sworn testimony and filed in a court of competent jurisdiction to try parties charged for the offense.

That, when read into the bill, will read this way:

> Whenever the executive authority of any State or Territory demands any person, as a fugitive from justice, of the executive authority of any State or Territory to which such person has fled, and produces a copy of an indictment found, an information made after an examination and the hearing of sworn testimony and filed in a court of competent jurisdiction to try parties charged for the offense, or an affidavit made before a magistrate of any State or Territory, charging the person demanded with having committed treason, felony, etc.

Now, that gives some responsibility to the presentment. As I understood the Senator from the State of Washington to say, in that State a prosecuting attorney may file a presentment and immediately demand a requisition, and the presentment need not be filed upon any testimony taken or upon any oath or responsible statement of any person. The law as it stands to-day has behind every act to be performed the responsibility of the party making the affidavit before the magistrate, the party who can be held responsible in the event of the charge being found frivolous or not being sustained; but in the case of a prosecuting officer who may go in and file a presentment there is no responsibility to protect the party who has perhaps been taken the entire length of the United States.

Much of the discussion of these questions has proceeded upon the assumption that he would be brought only from some convenient neighboring State, but if you take a man from Maine to California upon an irresponsible charge of a district attorney, who does not swear to the presentment, or, rather, to the statement, because he does not know the facts, and he may have learned them by rumor or through rumor only, and upon the first examination it is shown, first, that no crime has been committed, that the whole thing was a mistake; or, second, that the man at the time he was charged with doing this act was in Europe, or any of the hundred things that are interposed between a man as a defense against a charge, he has no relief. He has been taken under the humiliating circumstances of arrest from one end of the United States to the other, pointed out to the passengers on the train as a man who is charged with murder and is being taken out to California for trial, and, lo and behold, when the charge proves to be without any foundation he has no relief against any person. He has no guaranty against a frivolous charge, and it is a very serious matter. Had I not felt that it was I would not have started this discussion.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. HEYBURN. I yield.

Mr. PILES. I ask the Senator what protection a fugitive from justice would have before a justice of the peace?

Mr. HEYBURN. He has the responsibility of the man who made the oath charging him with the offense, and the justice of the peace is presumed, and fairly presumed, to take notice of the responsibility of the charging party. There is no law in any State under our system of government whereby a justice of the peace can act except upon a sworn statement. Except to apprehend a man for violating the law in his presence, he can not act upon his own initiative in holding a party or in issuing a warrant for him.

Mr. PILES. May I ask the Senator if he does not know that if A goes before a justice of the peace charging B with the commission of a crime, before the extradition can be brought about the affidavit must be submitted to the prosecuting attorney, who lays the matter before the governor? Why, then, is not the affidavit of the complaining witness filed with the prosecuting attorney just as potent as when filed with the justice of the peace?

Mr. HEYBURN. According to the Senator's statement——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho will suspend for a moment. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it is the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. PILES. I ask that the unfinished business be laid aside temporarily, without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Idaho will proceed.

Mr. HEYBURN. The Senator from Washington has stated within a few moments that no affidavit was required as a basis for the filing of an information by the district attorney, and it is true. That is the condition which existed when the English people rose up against just that system, where a man could be apprehended and placed on trial without any preliminary investigation; and the grand-jury system grew out of it, because it was thought wise in that day, and it is very wise in this age of sensationalism, that the charges men make attacking the integrity of others shall be submitted and sifted through the cool and conservative judgment of more than one man. Individuals know that if they file a sworn charge against a man which shall be the basis of his arrest that they are responsible not only in damages, but they are responsible for perjury and prosecution for the offense that they commit in making a false oath. Those things stand to-day against men and protect them from the annoyance and the injustice of being taken from one part of the country to another upon frivolous and irresponsible charges. Shall we remove them without having before us a copy of all the laws regulating the filing of information in the several States?

We have a statement from my colleague [Mr. BORAH] as to the law in the State of Idaho, in which he says that it is required under the provisions of that law that no information shall be filed except after the filing of a responsible statement under oath that the party is guilty of the crime charged against him. Then we come to the statement of the Senator from Washington that in his State no such oath is required. I think both of them are right. Then, I know of my own knowledge that in many States none is required, and in some States it is required.

We have had occasion to consider this matter in another committee of this body, and we are preparing careful legislation upon it. Whether or not it is wise to modify the very bulwark of our laws—the grand-jury provisions contemplated and provided for in the Constitution—I do not feel called upon to discuss at any length. I want to say——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. In just a moment. So far as my own judgment is concerned, as a member of the constitutional convention that framed the constitution of Idaho, and as chairman of the judiciary committee of that body, I opposed the modification of the grand-jury system.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. HEYBURN. I do.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The laws of perhaps one-half the States of the Union provide for prosecution by information. Under those informations a citizen may be arrested in the State; he may be incarcerated in the jail awaiting trial, if he is unable to give bail, or in a capital case incarcerated whether he can give bail or not, all upon information.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would have to go back to the consideration of the question in the light that it was presented to our constitutional convention, and I do not feel called upon to discuss the wisdom of the system of presenting criminal charges in that way. I only do not want the Government of the United States, as has been so well suggested by the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], to force this innovation upon other States that have repudiated this modified doctrine.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The point I want to direct the attention of the Senator from Idaho to is that under these informations in the State a citizen may be prosecuted, may be arrested, may be incarcerated in jail. I wanted to ask him whether he saw any greater hardship and outrage in the further provision that he may be brought from the State.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; I certainly do see an additional hardship. The man who is at his home and about his business can give quick response and make prompt defense against being taken away from his home for trial; but a man who is 3,000 miles away has no opportunity after he has traveled that distance and been taken on this humiliating trip from one part of the country to another to present himself before strangers in a strange community. There is a vast difference between being charged as you stand on your own threshold, where you can raise your hand in defense of yourself, and being charged thousands of miles away to answer at some future day before a strange tribunal. We must be more careful in providing for taking people from their homes to be inquired of as to whether there are probable grounds to charge them with a crime than in the case of the person who is right at home and may give a prompt answer. Therefore, I regard this as a most serious offense. I regard it in the light of a case that contemplates the bringing of a man from the farthest parts of our country, because there the burden is greatest. It is not to be minimized by presenting cases of bringing a man across a line, which might be 10 feet or 10 miles.

The people who framed the Constitution of the United States were conservative men. They were closer to the hour when civilized people realized and enacted that they should not be placed upon trial for crime until probable cause had been established through the medium of sworn testimony and careful examination by a grand jury of more than 16 or 24 men. That represented the conservatism of the day when they were making the fundamental law of this land, and the wisdom of that day is prime wisdom in this day.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to say only a very few words.

If the effect of this statute would be to impose an obligation upon a state executive with which he must comply, then it would be of the utmost importance to weigh every word, to see that no possible injustice could result in the obedience by the executive to the terms of the statute.

But, Mr. President, it has been well settled by the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States that the clause in the Constitution itself is but directory, and under those decisions it results that, whatever the moral obligation imposed by the federal law, the discretion, in practice at least, is with the state executive; that in such practice and in the absence of any power to compel him otherwise he may require such proof as he sees proper before he will honor a requisition, and that he has the power under the law to absolutely refuse it, whatever may be the extent of the proof submitted to him.

The case which has been alluded to by the Senator from Texas, and which has been commented upon by others, I hold in my hand—the case of the Commonwealth of Kentucky against Dennison, governor of Ohio—in which the Supreme Court of the United States lays down this as the law, so far as concerns the power to compel the state executive. In construing the section of the Constitution which the Senator from Idaho has read, and the statute passed in 1793 in pursuance thereof, the Supreme Court says:

> The word "duty," in the act of 1793, means the moral obligation of the State to perform the compact in the Constitution, when Congress had by that act regulated the mode in which the duty was to be performed.
> But Congress can not coerce a state officer, as such, to perform any duty by act of Congress. The state officer may perform it if he thinks proper, and it may be a moral duty to perform it. But if he refuses, no law of Congress can compel him.
> The governor of Ohio can not, through the judiciary or any other department of the General Government, be compelled to deliver up Lago—

That was the name of the fugitive—> and, upon that ground only, this motion for a mandamus was overruled.

This was a case of original jurisdiction in the Supreme Court of the United States, where there was an effort made by the State of Kentucky to have the Supreme Court issue a mandamus against the governor of Ohio.

Mr. President, the only effect of this bill is to put in a class which may be honored by a State informations which have not heretofore been included in that class by the statute, but which the governor can scan and scrutinize and demand proof under just as he can now demand it under indictments and under an affidavit made before a magistrate.

The Senator from New York suggests in response to that contention, a contention to which there can be no possible reply under the decisions of the Supreme Court, that we are called upon to pass a law which we recognize the right of a State to refuse to comply with, and which we in effect invite him to refuse to comply with. If that is a legitimate criticism upon this bill, it is a criticism upon the law as it now exists, a law which has been upon the statute books for one hundred and seventeen years. There is nothing in the proposed bill which will change that feature of the law, and the same construction of the Supreme Court which applies to the law as it now exists will apply to it and control it if the amendment is adopted.

It is perfectly competent for the executive of a State, and it is not only competent but a matter of most frequent occurrence for an executive, when a requisition is presented, to demand the proof upon which the requisition is based. He is not shut up in practice to a blind compliance with the requirement that he shall surrender the fugitive upon the presentation of a requisition based upon an indictment or upon an affidavit before a magistrate.

Mr. MCCUMBER. May I make a suggestion to the Senator right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BACON. With pleasure.

Mr. MCCUMBER. I do not think there is a State in the United States that has not a provision in its own laws to govern the governor in granting such a requisition, stating to him what evidence he shall receive in order to honor it, and fully protecting in every manner the citizen who is sought to be removed from that State.

Mr. BACON. I think the Senator is quite correct. I know that frequently in my State requisitions have been refused, some of them, I recollect, within the past year or two. I doubt if there is a single State in the Union, certainly not one which has been in the Union a number of years, where circumstances have not occurred under which the executive has refused to honor a requisition. It is at last within the discretion of the executive, and under the decisions of the Supreme Court any statute which we pass on the subject is not mandatory, but simply suggestive or directory, and under the decision of the Supreme Court the provision in the Constitution itself is but directory, and suggesting that which may be recognized as a moral obligation. There can be no possibility that under this law there could be any injustice worked, unless the executive is absolutely blind to the protection of the man within his jurisdiction whose extradition is sought.

I repeat, Mr. President, that if this statute were obligatory upon a state executive—one which he would be bound to obey, one which the federal law could force him to obey—then we could not be too careful to weigh every word and every syllable to see to it that no injustice could be done in the extradition of an innocent man or in the extradition of any man upon insufficient evidence of the fact that he should be brought to trial; but there is no possibility of that, unless the executive is absolutely blind in the exercise of his own powers and in the performance of his duties.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, in consideration of the importance of the matter, the variety of views, and the different conditions in the several States as to procedure, I move that the bill be recommitted to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I hope that motion will not prevail, for this bill has previously been before the Judiciary Committee. It passed this body last winter. It has been twice thoroughly examined.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, of course the motion of the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD] is made with the idea that the Judiciary Committee may perhaps be able to give further consideration to this bill than has heretofore been accorded it. I understood the Senator to make a motion to recommit the bill.

Mr. CRAWFORD. That was my motion. Certainly it was not made with any idea that the Judiciary Committee had not conscientiously dealt with the bill, but in consideration of the different views expressed here.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think I thoroughly understand the Senator's position and his desire; but I want to say to him that I do not believe, as a matter of practical importance, the recommittal of this bill would make any difference whatever in the report that would come into this body for the third or the fourth time. This is a bill which has been very thoroughly considered by the Committee on the Judiciary. Whether well considered and a proper conclusion arrived at or not, of course, is for the Senate to determine for itself; but so far as further consideration of the bill before the committee is concerned, I am sure it would result in exactly the same thing which we have before the Senate at the present moment. I therefore hope that the motion will not prevail.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, in view of that statement of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Dakota withdraws his motion to recommit.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I wish to move to strike out, in line 10, on page 2 of the bill, the two words "six months" and insert in lieu thereof "a reasonable time." I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill if the words "six months," in which the agent is to appear after a man has been arrested in any State and to remove him to the State where the crime has been committed, are a part of the law as it now stands?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. That is a part of the law as it now stands and has been for many years. The only change proposed to the law is in the insertion of the four words relating to the information.

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have the Senator give a good reason why, with the railroad facilities we have to-day, but which we did not have one hundred and seventeen years ago, we should still retain that provision of six months—allow an arrest to be made of a man in New York charged with an offense in the State of Wyoming, and allow the authorities of New York, at the instigation of the authorities of Wyoming, to hold the prisoner for six months after he has been imprisoned before an agent shall come to remove him.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator that I do not care to express an opinion upon that matter, because it is not a matter which goes to the amendment now before the Senate; and it is a matter which I think was not considered at all in committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. But it goes to the amendment I have just now offered.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I do not know that I have any reason to urge against the amendment proposed by the Senator; but that is a matter for the Senate itself to consider.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we insert in line 10 the words "a reasonable time" before the words "from the time of the arrest," we allow the governor of the State in which the party has been arrested to determine what is a reasonable length of time for an agent to appear and remove from his jurisdiction the person charged. I have known cases where it has been abused. For that reason I hope the Senator will consent to this amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from North Dakota that the Senator from Wyoming is not in charge of the bill. It is in charge of the Senator from Washington [Mr. PILES].

Mr. PILES. I see no objection to the amendment.

Mr. McCUMBER. It seems to me it is fair.

Mr. PILES. The bill as drawn in that respect is according to existing law, and I did not therefore propose to change it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair suggests to the Senator from Wyoming that there is an amendment now pending offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. McCUMBER. I will then withdraw my amendment until the previous amendment has been disposed of.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I think it is quite apparent that a vote can not be reached on the pending bill to-day; and for the purpose of allowing time for further reflection, and possibly an adjustment of differences of opinion on this measure, I ask unanimous consent that Senate bill 5876, being the postal savings-bank bill, be now taken up. There are one or two amendments to that bill to be disposed of.

Mr. PILES. The bill I have in charge is now under consideration.

Mr. CARTER. I ask that the bill may be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. PILES. I do not care to consent to that, Mr. President. There is reason for passing this bill. I understand the Senator wants the bill temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CARTER. I desire that the bill shall be temporarily laid aside for the purpose of proceeding with some amendments to the postal savings-bank bill.

Mr. PILES. That would take the whole afternoon.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, permit me to suggest to the Senator from Washington that there is a desire for an executive session, that there are certain committee meetings which will be held which will call a number of Senators from the Chamber, and I doubt if any progress can be made on the pending bill. I think, however, we can make some progress on a few amendments to the postal savings-bank bill.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I want to leave this question to the Senate. If Senators are disposed to prohibit the States that have laws providing for prosecution by information to be without the right of extradition except upon an affidavit filed with a justice of the peace or upon an indictment duly found, then let them say so. The junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], who was formerly governor of that State, told me just a few moments ago that when he was governor of Oregon he asked for a fugitive from justice in the State of California, and under the decision reported in Sixty-third Federal Reporter, to which I have referred, his request was refused. I should like to have this bill disposed of at an early date, in order to avoid future complications.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I want to ask if, after all, this does not subject the fugitive—or, we will say, the man who is claimed to be a fugitive—to precisely the same rule as the people of a State who continue there?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Absolutely, Mr. President. I want to say in this connection——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Just for a moment.

Mr. President, the people of a State of this Union, within the Constitution, have a right to prescribe the methods by which they shall prosecute crime. The people of certain States, within that limitation, have prescribed that crime may be prosecuted by information. The people of certain other States desire to make their States a harbor of refuge, apparently, because they say that Washington can not go into New York—shall not take a Washington criminal back to his home and have him tried according to the laws of the State wherein the crime has been committed.

Mr. President, it takes a far clearer vision than mine to see anything unconstitutional in that; it takes a far clearer vision than mine to find any overriding of the rights of a citizen of the State in that. It seems to me, if the matter is thoroughly understood, that there can be but one result. I hope that the vote will be taken this afternoon.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I know of a number of instances in which the power to refuse the surrender of a fugitive has been grossly abused. I do not recall an instance in which the power to surrender him has been improperly exercised. If a citizen of one State visits another State and transgresses its laws, surely if the citizens who continue their residence there and never leave it may be prosecuted in any way, the fugitive is entitled to no greater protection. Without naming cases, the Senate itself will recall that the power of the governor has been interposed on more than one occasion to shield from the justice of an offended Commonwealth criminals of a higher or lower degree. There is now—and it will occur to the mind of every Senator here—an instance where for years a man charged with a grave crime in one State has been sheltered and protected by the executive authority of a neighboring State. More than twelve years ago the State which I have the honor in part to represent indicted certain people, residents and citizens of another State, and though often solicited to surrender them for trial in our State their surrender was denied.

Mr. President, remembering that if any federal right is involved it can be protected in a proper proceeding, it seems to me that the States could safely be trusted. That is especially true, as suggested by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], in view of the fact that a State can not be compelled under this statute to surrender a fugitive. I believe that fugitives can be taken, the protest of the State notwithstanding, under a federal law. I believe there is no provision of the Federal Constitution which can be made to depend for the faithful execution of it upon the will of a state official, but we have not seen fit, and I hope we never shall see fit, to undertake by direct federal authority to enforce that provision. It has been well settled in the case of Dennison v. McGoffin, or, as it is sometimes styled, and I believe styled in the reports, the Commonwealth of Kentucky v. Dennison, where the governor of Kentucky sought to compel by mandamus the governor of Ohio to surrender a free negro, who had aided slaves to escape, and had thus violated the Kentucky statute made in that behalf, that under this statute a State can not be compelled to surrender.

The Supreme Court of the United States declared that it was the duty of the governor of Ohio to surrender him and that the governor of Ohio had no discretion in the matter, but they held—and I think they very properly held—that the Federal Government could enact no law requiring a state officer to execute a federal statute.

My recollection is that there is an earlier case, probably of Prigg v. The Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, in which a magistrate of the State was required to perform certain duties with respect to the fugitive slave law, and the court intimated in that case that a State could not be compelled to execute a state law.

So, Mr. President, it being true that, after all, under the statute which we are now proposing to amend, and under the law as it will stand after this amendment is enacted, a governor may still refuse to deliver a fugitive, I think the Congress could well afford to say that a man who commits an offense, or who is charged with committing an offense in a State, and flees to another State might be taken back upon the same proceeding under which a citizen of that State could be arraigned. I think there is no danger in it, and I believe this bill ought to pass.

I want to say, Mr. President, that I do not believe in the abolition of the grand jury. It is an ancient and useful institution. I do not believe that any one man on earth ought to, upon his own motion, though it receive the sanction of his oath, call his fellow-citizen before the bar of justice and charge him with a crime; but if the State of Washington chooses to do it, or the State of California, and I am told that the State of California has absolutely abolished the grand jury, and the State of Washington has disused it——

Mr. PILES. It is used about once a year.

Mr. BAILEY. It ought to be used every time the court convenes, and no man ought to be called, and, under the Federal Constitution no man can be called, to answer for an infamous crime except upon an indictment or presentment of a grand jury. I think that ought to be the law. I would not vote in any legislature to abolish the grand jury or permit it to fall into disuse; but if any State in this Union chooses to do it, I am willing to subject all the people who visit that Commonwealth to the same measure and rule of justice which it applies to its own people.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I will call the attention of the Senator from Texas to the fact that it does not follow necessarily that the party charged with a crime has been in the State seeking to extradite him. I have in mind a number of cases, some of which arose in the State so ably represented by the Senator from Texas, where the parties never were within the state lines, but they were indicted for violating the state laws through the means of their agents and agencies. That question has arisen all over the United States.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, that is true, and of course that raises the old question as to whether such a man was a fugitive from justice within the meaning of the act or within the meaning of the Constitution. My own opinion is that it was intended to make every man who violates the law of the State amenable to the authority of that State.

Mr. HEYBURN. As a fugitive or otherwise.

Mr. BAILEY. I think so.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think that the weight of opinion is that way, but there has been quite a diversity of opinion upon it.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true; but that is a matter which the governor of the State could consider, and it seems that was the consideration which controlled the governor of a great State in a case which I now have in my mind. I would have to be absolutely convinced, if I were the governor of a State, that a citizen of the State of which I was the governor was being taken back to another State for the purpose of practicing some grave injustice upon him before I would dishonor the requisition of any Commonwealth of this Republic. I have not seen many innocent men punished; but, instead of permitting ninety-nine guilty ones to go free in order certainly to avoid the punishment of that one innocent man, I have seen nine hundred and ninety-nine guilty men go free. So I think nobody in this country is in any grave danger of that, and yet I do not want to make it easy to convict people.

I do not forget, Mr. President, that there was a time in the history of the world, and that time may come again, when corrupt and tyrannical officials would employ the court as a means of freeing their power from the criticism of upright and courageous men. I do not believe that we progress in any real sense when we undertake to make the conviction of a citizen easy of accomplishment. But all I say, and all I desired to say, is that we can safely trust the States of this Union to administer their criminal laws. If they have erred at all their error has been in being altogether too liberal to the men who have violated and defied their authority.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, this condition has occurred to me as possible: A man is arrested in the State of California, and the officer starts to the State of New York with him. He comes to a State in which a man can not be held at all except upon indictment or presentment of a grand jury, and he has telegraphed ahead, as I have known it to be done, to have all the papers drawn and an application for a writ of habeas corpus prepared. As the train speeds through a State within which a man can not be held upon anything but an indictment or a presentment of a grand jury, they take him off the train and bring him up before the court. I have a very vivid recollection of that being resorted to during the very strenuous times of serious labor difficulties some years ago, when men were taken off the train three or four times and subjected to the ordeal of the courts in an application for a writ of habeas corpus. I could name an instance that would probably sound familiar to two or three Senators whom I see before me, where men were taken off trains. In the State of Idaho, Mr. President, we have to pass through two other States in going from the northern portion of the State to the southern portion, and before that State was divided into judicial districts we experienced that difficulty. As we would go into the State of Washington on our way with a prisoner to try him at Boise, a writ would be sued out in Washington, and then, if that ordeal was passed, when we would strike the next State—the State of Oregon, through which we must pass—a writ would be sued out in Oregon. If we finally got the prisoner to Boise, we did so more because we had possession of him as a matter of fact than because we had legal possession of him. That condition would readily arise under this provision in the law. A man who was in the State, for the purposes of protection may invoke the laws of the State in which he is, and no other State can interfere. No other State can exercise jurisdiction over a man who is in a neighboring State. If a man who has not been convicted of crime and is not under the ban of the judgment of the law is passing through Iowa, he may appeal to the laws of the State in which he is, and neither the State of New York nor its administrative government can exercise any power to protect him against being taken off a train in the State of Iowa, and we can not give them such power. No act of Congress can confer that power.

So, does it not occur to Senators that we are simply laying the foundation for trouble in providing for the exercise of a right in the face of the differing laws of the several States, and could we not more intelligently legislate upon this subject if we had the time and the opportunity to have before us the laws of the several States in this Union upon this question?

It is true that they all have statutes regulating, so far as they may, the exercise of this right.

Why not be patient in legislating upon a great question? This is a great question; it was the greatest question that ever arose in the history of the English people; it caused the greatest revolution in the laws of the English-speaking people that ever occurred, and that is the establishment of a tribunal that should stand of right between the man charged and the jurisdiction that might try him. It built a bulwark of safety against putting men upon trial upon the mere request or the single statement of any man. Do you not think we had better postpone the final disposition of this matter until we can be better prepared to exercise an ultimate judgment that shall be far-reaching? This is the first time, so far as I know, that the question of the abolition of grand juries has been before Congress. No one ever had the temerity to propose to abolish the grand-jury system as a part of the federal procedure, and I doubt if the sentiment of this body is in favor of it or could be favorable to it. If that is true, we ought not, merely because our ox is not gored, to indulge in legislation that is a violation of the principles that actuate us in dealing with the things that pertain to our own interests.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10——

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over, Mr. President.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I am perfectly willing that this bill shall go over. The Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] wants to present some amendments to the postal savings-bank bill. I therefore ask leave now to let the pending bill go over until after the conclusion of the morning business on Monday morning, subject, of course, to the unfinished business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. I call attention to the position in which the amendment has been placed on page 7 of the bill. The amendment of the Senator from Utah, on page 7, should, I think, be placed after the word "California," on page 8. I move that that transposition be made.

The SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah——

Mr. CARTER. It is on page 7.

The SECRETARY. The proviso on page 7, after the word "received," at the end of line 14, it is now proposed to insert after the word "California," in line 3 on page 8.

Mr. SMOOT. I have not the bill with me, but I take it the transposition does not affect the meaning in any way or the terms of the amendment.

Mr. CARTER. It does not affect the provisions of the amendment at all. It is for the purpose of permitting continuity of the text, which is not at all interfered with except by the wrong placing of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. Will the Senator from Montana yield for a question or two?

Mr. CARTER. With pleasure.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana what is the relation of the Government to the depositor under this bill? Is it that of trustee or of debtor?

Mr. CARTER. The relation of debtor and creditor, according to my view, arises between the Government and the depositor.

Mr. BURTON. What provision is made in this bill for the payment to the depositor in case the funds deposited by the Government with the banks should prove insufficient or should not be promptly paid over?

Mr. CARTER. The Government would be liable for payment to the parties. That contingency to which the Senator refers is of course quite remote. There is no appropriation in this bill to meet that contingency, and that is not done because it is believed under the provisions of this bill the funds deposited will always be subject to check and call for the purpose of repayment to the depositor, the payment of expenses, and charges against the fund.

Mr. BURTON. Does not the Senator from Montana think it possible that in time of stress the funds in the banks would not be readily available for payment of the claims of depositors?

Mr. CARTER. The funds, according to the terms of the bill, would always be subject to check for any of the purposes contemplated by the bill. If the banks in one State should fail to respond to a demand made for repayment, then the moneys could be withdrawn from any other State. Of course if the banks universally failed all over the country, the Government would still be liable to the depositors at the post-offices for the amounts of their respective deposits.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator from Montana think this bill provides a proper system for the prompt payment of the obligations without any reserve fund?

Mr. CARTER. I have thought from the beginning that a reserve fund should be provided, and an amendment offered yesterday had that in contemplation. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] has an amendment to present which, I think, will more effectively and concisely cover the reserve point than the amendment yesterday proposed. The substance of the text as amended yesterday will not be changed, but by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont the phraseology will be very much improved.

Mr. BURTON. As I understand, the provision on page 8, to the effect that the board of trustees shall maintain a reserve either with the Treasurer of the United States or with the banks, was stricken out.

Mr. CARTER. It was stricken out; and in lieu of that provision I shall, with much pleasure, support the amendment to be presented by the Senator from Vermont, which provides for a reserve as well as making provision for the payment of depositors.

Mr. BURTON. That is all.

Mr. PAGE. In order that the amendment may be before the Senate, I ask leave to introduce it at this time, to wit, to strike out all after the word "situated," in the seventh line, down to and including the word "Territories," in line 11 on the same page, and to insert in lieu thereof what I will ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Vermont, as the Chair understands, offers the proposed amendment to have it pending, and he asks unanimous consent that it may be considered as pending. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER. Has the other amendment, the one proposed by me, been disposed of?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The transposition?

Mr. CARTER. Yes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It was agreed to.

Mr. CARTER. Then there is no amendment now pending, except that offered by the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. GALLINGER. Except, I will suggest to the Senator, that this is an amendment to the amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole, which is not, under the rules, allowable, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. CARTER. Except by unanimous consent; and I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the amendment presented by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Montana? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 6, line 7, in the committee amendment already agreed to, strike out the words:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

And in lieu of those words insert:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges of the system herein established, and to provide an adequate reserve fund.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana whether he would not consider it advisable to reduce the minimum rate of interest to 1½ per cent?

Mr. CARTER. Does the Senator mean the minimum to be paid to the depositor?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. We arbitrarily fix the amount to be paid to the depositor at 2 per cent. There is no minimum or maximum named. The amount paid to the depositors is 2 per cent per annum; and I do not think that that rate ought to be reduced, nor do I think it would be prudent to leave to the board the discretion to pay a higher rate, because that would be a standing invitation to the board to raise the rate.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I was going to suggest to the Senator if the rate to the depositor could be made 1½ per cent and the rate the Government received 2 per cent, it seems to me there would be less fault found with the legislation and the results would be equally good.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will permit me, I will call attention to the rates paid by the respective governments maintaining postal savings systems, from which record it will appear that we here propose the smallest rate paid by postal savings banks in any country. Austria pays 3 per cent; Belgium, up to $386, 3 per cent, on excess over $386, 2 per cent; Bulgaria pays 4 per cent; France pays 2½ per cent; Hungary pays 3 per cent; Italy, 2.4 per cent; the Netherlands, 2.64 per cent; Sweden, 3.6 per cent; the United Kingdom, 2½ per cent; in the Bahamas, 2½ per cent, as in the United Kingdom; British Guiana, 2.4 per cent; Canada, 3 per cent; British India, 3–3½ per cent; Ceylon, 2.4 per cent; Straits Settlements, 3 per cent; the Dutch East Indies, 2.4 per cent; Japan, 4.8 per cent; and so on through the various countries having these postal savings, none of which pays as low a rate as that provided for in this bill.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If the Senator will pardon me, I want to suggest that the higher the rate paid by the Government the greater the burden placed upon this fund. We must loan that fund at a higher rate than we pay or it would not be satisfactory to the people. Suppose 10,000,000 people used this bank. I believe in England 11,000,000 use it, and in Japan five or eight millions.

Mr. CARTER. Eight millions, about.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If 10,000,000 people in this country—men, women, and children—use it, the other 80,000,000 people are going to be burdened with the increased value of that money for commercial and industrial purposes.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator will permit me, our points of view seem to be entirely different. According to my theory—and I think that theory is based upon widespread observation and the announced experience of others—the money which will be deposited in the post-offices is not now available in the main for use in trade or commerce at all. It is money that is not now deposited in the banks or put to any useful purpose. It is largely hoarded money or small sums which in detail are of little consequence, but in the aggregate would make up a large sum. Therefore, instead of being a burden upon the community, this line of deposits would enrich the channels of trade by putting new blood into the arteries of commerce.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Yes, Mr. President. The Senator from Montana is undoubtedly correct. But when 5,000 banks in the United States pay no interest at all upon deposits I think it is of very questionable wisdom for the Government to establish by law its intention to pay interest upon deposits except for the necessities of the Government.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator refers to national banks. There are 6,893 national banks in the United States, according to the report of the Monetary Commission. It is true that every bank of the 6,893 has deposits on which no interest is paid. That is true, likewise, of state banks. In very rare cases do the banks allow interest on daily or monthly balances.

But almost every national bank and certainly every state bank pays some interest on time deposits. These deposits are not subject to check. They are generally evidenced by a certificate issued, naming the amount, the date of the deposit, the agreed time of payment, and the rate of interest.

So it may be stated, as the Senator puts it, that every one of these banks has deposits on which no interest at all is paid. At the same time almost every one of them has deposits on which interest is paid, and this rate of 2½ per cent, let me say to the Senator, is so far below the average rate paid that this money will certainly be a boon to the banks paying a larger rate on current deposits.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I do not know whether I am exact about it or not, but I hazard the opinion that the average rate of interest upon bank deposits is very little above the figure provided in this bill reported by the Senator from Montana. But I find, upon examination of the reports of the Monetary Commission, that upward of $6,000,000,000 receives no interest at all. I can readily understand that if the moneys accumulated by foreign countries are to be used to defray the general expenses of their government, or are to be segregated for the purpose of a limited use by those governments, they might of necessity pay more and be willing to do so. But I contend that if this postal savings-bank law goes into effect and 2 per cent is to be paid upon the deposits millions of dollars will be withdrawn from the ordinary channels of commerce and trade, whereas if you make the rate to be paid smaller it will be an inducement, as soon as the depositor recovers his confidence in the Government and in the country, to put his money into private enterprise, where it ought to be employed.

I look with a great deal of suspicion upon any suggestion for our Government to direct the personal affairs of its citizens. I do not care how humble that citizen may be or how dependent he may be, he will be a better man, stronger and more self-reliant, if he uses his own ideas and his own common sense and experience. Lose or win, as he may here or there, he will become a far more helpful citizen if he conducts his own affairs in the battle with his fellows, and he will be a better member of the community than he will if the Government takes him in hand.

I do not like to see our Government embark upon any such course. I feel that anything which dulls the individual initiative is harmful to our people, and the results no one can foretell.

I think I might, if I cared to speak invidiously of other countries, say that some of the countries named by the Senator from Montana have for years been endeavoring to throw off that torpor due to governmental initiative, and they will be stronger and more self-reliant when they succeed in doing it.

Now, I do not want to antagonize the proposition that there should be some place of safety for the timid to place their money, but I would hold out as little inducement as possible, so that when he recovers his confidence he will withdraw his savings from the limited avenue into which the Senator would place it and invest it in the broad fields of commercial enterprise, where labor is employed and enterprise and thrift prevail.

Mr. CULLOM. Would the Senator from Montana object to allowing this amendment to go over, in order that we may have a brief executive session?

Mr. CARTER. I presume the amendment can be disposed of now. It is largely——

Mr. DOLLIVER. If I caught the trend of the amendment, it restores to the bill a scheme of policy which was affirmatively stricken out by the Senate on a former day. This bill as originally reported contemplated a reserve fund in the Treasury for the current redemption of these accounts, and if I understood correctly the debate and the action of the Senate it was determined to make this redemption at the banks and not at the Treasury at all.

I doubt the propriety of submitting, in the absence of those interested in striking that out from the original bill, an amendment which restores the policy of making the redemptions at the Treasury within the discretion of these trustees.

Mr. CARTER. The amendment has been submitted, I think, to the Senator's colleague, and is agreeable to him. It does not effect the restoration of the provision for the deposit of anything in the Treasury or change the place of deposit at all.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I understand, however, that the rate of interest charged for the deposit of this money in the banks is made elastic, and the standard upon which it is charged as the maximum is an amount sufficient to pay the current interest and the expenses of administration and to keep up a reserve fund.

Mr. CARTER. To provide an adequate reserve fund.

Mr. DOLLIVER. That is certainly worse than this bill originally contemplated, because in the original bill we made at least a maximum limitation upon the reserve fund; and if this amendment is adopted it restores the discretion in the trustees to so adjust the rate of interest as to draw into the Treasury any sum of money which in their discretion may be necessary at any particular time. I think if that is done, it ought to be done in a more elaborate way.

Mr. CARTER. There is no provision in the amendment to put anything into the Treasury, but since the Senator's mind is not at rest on the amendment at this time, the amendment not having been printed, I will yield to the Senator from Illinois for the motion he desires to make.

Mr. GALLINGER. Before the Senator from Illinois makes his motion, I desire to ask the Senator from Vermont what he regards as an adequate reserve. "Adequate reserve" is a rather elastic term.

Mr. PAGE. I confess there is a little elasticity to that term, but I can not believe that the board of trustees, who are to be appointed by the bill, will misuse the term, nor can I believe that my good friend the Senator from New Hampshire, coming from the State he does, would believe that it would be advisable to pay a higher rate of interest than would save, probably, the necessity of making a direct appropriation from the Treasury to take care of any loss which might occur.

Mr. GALLINGER. No. But the point I wanted to suggest was that I think it is almost universal, with great financial institutions, insurance companies, and others, for the law to require a certain specified percentage of reserve. Why should we leave this optional with three men to make the reserve 5 per cent or 6 per cent or 1 per cent, when it ought to be 10 per cent? It seems to me we ought to be able to reach a conclusion as to what an adequate reserve would be. That I will press a little further later on.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 3 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 7, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

Mr. OVERMAN. I introduce a joint resolution and ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 75) postponing the time of making returns and assessments under the operation of the corporation-tax law was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 75.

Resolved, etc., That whereas certain cases are now pending in the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of testing the validity and constitutionality of the provision known as the "corporation-tax provision" contained in section 38 of Public Law No. 5, entitled "An act to provide revenue, equalize duties, and encourage the industries of the United States, and for other purposes," that the time fixed for giving in returns and making assessments under the provision of said act be, and the same is hereby, postponed for sixty days from and after the passage of this joint resolution, and the corporation tax provided for in said section of said act shall not be assessable until three calendar months after the time for making returns has expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

By Mr. CLAY:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 76) donating to the State of Georgia one brass cannon; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

FORMATION OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming introduced a bill (S. 6186) to provide for the formation of corporations to engage in interstate and international trade and commerce, which was read the first time by its title.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I ask that the bill be read the second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I suggest that the bill should be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce, and I make a motion to that effect.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. If the Senator will take the pains to read the bill, he will find that it is a bill which should, beyond all question, go to the Committee on the Judiciary; that the question of the constitutional right to form such corporations is the prime question in the bill. The question of policy, as to whether such corporations should be formed, is a question that follows on and is incidental to the main question in the bill.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I would ask the Chair what is the proper method of proceeding in this matter? Is it to have the bill lie on the table, to have the motion considered to-morrow, or to take it up now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there is objection to the second reading of the bill, it will go over until to-morrow.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Then, I object to the second reading of the bill, and to-morrow I will move its reference to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill, having been read the first time, will go over.

TRAVEL ALLOWANCE FOR POSTAL CLERKS.

Mr. BURROWS submitted an amendment authorizing the Postmaster-General to make a travel allowance in lieu of actual expenses to each railway postal clerk who is assigned to duty in a railway post-office, at the rate of 25 cents for each meal and lodging, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the post-office appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads and ordered to be printed.

VALLEY PAPER COMPANY.

Mr. SMOOT. I offer a resolution, and, as it is a privileged question, I ask for its immediate consideration.

The resolution (S. Res. 173) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Senate resolution 173.

Whereas REED SMOOT, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr., and DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, member of the United States Senate, who, together with three Members of the House of Representatives, constituting the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, have at the instance of the Valley Paper Company (Incorporated), plaintiffs, been sued in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, as members of the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, calling in question their action as members of such joint committee, in rejecting the proposal of the said Valley Paper Company (Incorporated) for furnishing paper for public printing and binding for the period from March 1, 1910, to February 28, 1911, as was done by said Joint Committee on Printing of Congress at the present session of Congress; and

Whereas it is prayed by the said plaintiffs or petitioners that a writ of mandamus issue directing said members of the Joint Committee on

Printing of Congress, to wit, that they withdraw awards which have heretofore been made and that they award certain contracts to the plaintiffs; and

Whereas the following rule to show cause has been issued by Mr. Justice Wright, of the supreme court of the District of Columbia, to wit:

In the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

THE VALLEY PAPER COMPANY (INCORPORATED), plaintiff, v. THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING OF CONGRESS, composed of REED SMOOT, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr., DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, GEORGE C. STURGISS, ALLEN F. COOPER, and DAVID E. FINLEY, respondents. } At law, No. —.

FLETCHER, GEORGE C. STURGISS, ALLEN F. COOPER, and DAVID E. FINLEY, members of the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, show cause, if any they may have, on or before the 11th day of February, 1910, at 10 o'clock, a. m., why a writ of mandamus should not be issued as prayed in said petition; provided a copy of said petition and this rule be served upon said respondents, members of the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, on or before the 7th day of February, 1910.

J. R. YOUNG, Clerk.
By H. BINGHAM, Assistant Clerk.

Therefore be it

Resolved, That said rule be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire and report what action the Senate should take in the premises, and particularly in the matter of instructing the said REED SMOOT, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr., and DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, as to the course they should pursue in the premises.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

Mr. CLAY. I introduce two resolutions and ask for their immediate consideration.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The first resolution sent to the desk by the Senator from Georgia will be read.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 170) as follows:

Senate resolution 170.

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative cost, in the United States, of transporting publications, designated as second-class mail by mail, express, and fast freight.

Second. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid by the United States Government and by the express companies to the principal railroad companies in the United States for similar service in transporting publications designated as second-class mail matter.

Third. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid to the leading railroad companies for transporting the several classes of mail of the Government of the United States, and for similar service paid by the express companies to the principal railroad companies in the United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. PENROSE. I should like to have the resolution go over until I can examine it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the resolution will go over. The Senator from Georgia offers another resolution, and requests its immediate consideration. The resolution will be read.

The resolution (S. Res. 171) was read as follows:

Senate resolution 171.

Resolved, That the Postmaster-General be, and he is hereby, directed by the Senate to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative postal rates for transporting periodicals designated as second-class mail in the United States with rates in foreign countries.

Second. He is directed specially to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid to the leading railroads for transporting the several classes of mail of the Government of the United States, Canada, Great Britain, and France, in their respective countries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ALDRICH. I think both resolutions ought to go to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CLAY. I prefer to have the resolution go over until to-morrow rather than to have it committed at this time. There is a resolution of a similar character pending, I think, before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. It was adopted by the Senate some weeks ago. I think the information can be furnished by the Interstate Commerce Commission without much expense, as the information, I understand, has already been collected. I prefer to have the resolution go over rather than to have it committed to the committee at this time.

Mr. PENROSE. Let the resolution go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution will go over.

WASHINGTON GAS LIGHT COMPANY.

Mr. BROWN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 172), which was referred to the Committee on Corporations Organized in the District of Columbia:

Senate resolution 172.

Resolved, That the Attorney-General of the United States be requested to inform the Senate what legal authority, if any, exists for the present capitalization of the Washington Gas Light Company, a corporation existing and doing business in the District of Columbia, and what legal authority, if any, exists for an increase of the present capitalization of said corporation.

RIPARIAN AND WATER RIGHTS.

Mr. NELSON. I ask unanimous consent that the paper which I send to the desk may be printed as a Senate document. It is a brief which has been prepared by the Committee on Public Lands in reference to the riparian and water rights of the Government and of the various States. Fifty copies have been printed, the extent the committee could have printed, and there is a great demand for it. I move that it be printed as a document.

The motion was agreed to.

LIQUOR TRAFFIC IN HAWAII.

Mr. PILES. On behalf of the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE], and owing to the fact that Senate bill No. 5253, to prohibit the selling of intoxicating beverages in the Territory of Hawaii, is now before the Committee on Pacific Islands and Porto Rico for consideration, I ask that the following brief on that bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the paper was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Referring to the bill (S. 5253) now pending before the Senate Committee on the Pacific Islands and Porto Rico, to enact a prohibitory law for the Territory of Hawaii, I desire to submit the following facts and considerations, each of which has a direct bearing on the principle involved in the proposed legislation:

First. That for over half a century previous to annexation Hawaii enjoyed a constitutional government and was recognized as an independent nation, both by the European governments and by the United States.

Second. That Hawaii did not become a Territory of the United States either through conquest or purchase; that its annexation was brought about solely and only by a treaty negotiated between two sovereign nations by commissioners appointed by the United States of America and the Republic of Hawaii, respectively, and treating as equals.

Third. That the treaty entered into on the 16th of June, 1897, by the representatives of the two Governments stipulated the terms on which such annexation should be consummated.

Fourth. That the Hawaiian Senate on September 9, 1897, ratified the above treaty in the following words:

"Be it resolved by the Senate of the Republic of Hawaii, That the Senate hereby ratifies and advises and consents to the ratification by the President of the treaty between the Republic of Hawaii and the United States of America on the subject of the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States of America, concluded at Washington on the 16th day of June, A. D. 1897."

Fifth. That the above treaty was ratified on the part of the United States by the joint resolution of annexation approved July 7, 1898.

That resolution recites, in part, as follows:

"Whereas the Government of the Republic of Hawaii having in due form signified its consent, in the manner provided by its constitution, to cede absolutely and without reserve to the United States of America all right of sovereignty, of whatsoever kind, in and over the Hawaiian Islands, etc.: Therefore

"Resolved, etc., That said cession is accepted, ratified, and confirmed," etc.

In order to further carry out the mutual character of that treaty the joint resolution further provided:

"The President shall appoint five commissioners, at least two of whom shall be residents of the Hawaiian Islands, who shall recommend to Congress such legislation concerning the Hawaiian Islands as they shall deem necessary or proper."

President McKinley, in pursuance of the above, appointed Hon. S. M. CULLOM and Hon. John T. Morgan, of the United States Senate; Hon. R. R. HITT, of the House of Representatives; and Hon. Sanford B. Dole and Hon. W. F. Frear, of Hawaii.

This commission, after extensive hearings held in Hawaii, and after a thorough consideration of all local laws and conditions, reported a form of organic act for the Territory of Hawaii, which act was, in all substantial forms, enacted into law by the act of Congress approved April 30, 1900.

Sixth. That because Hawaii, as an independent government, voluntarily ceded its domain to the United States, in view of the high standard of self-government already attained by the people of these islands, and, further, because of the inherent reasons for giving an isolated community such as Hawaii the largest measure of local autonomy, the Congress saw fit to confer upon the Territory of Hawaii in its organic act certain broader powers than have ever been given to any other Territory of the United States.

Seventh. That because of the satisfactory showing made by the territorial government of Hawaii since annexation Congress has seen fit to enlarge those powers of self-government in certain respects, and in no case heretofore have those powers been lessened or infringed upon.

Eighth. That section 55 of the organic act provides:

"That the legislative powers of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States locally applicable."

Ninth. That, acting under the legislative authority vested in it by the organic act, the territorial legislature has enacted a rigid law for the regulation of the liquor traffic in Hawaii. Under this law a board of license commissioners is appointed by the governor for each county. The members of these boards serve without remuneration, and no one interested, either directly or indirectly, in the liquor business can be a member of such boards. The citizens now serving on these boards are, for the most part, men of distinctly temperance sentiment. In fact, in the county of Kauai the board has refused to issue any saloon licenses whatever, thus practically establishing local prohibition on one of the four largest islands of the group.

Section 4 of the Hawaiian liquor law provides that—

"Each license board, within its own county, shall have the sole power, authority, and discretion to grant, refuse, suspend, revoke, regulate, and control licenses to sell intoxicating liquors in such county, subject only to the limitations and directions in this act contained. The exercise of the power, authority, and discretion by the act vested in the board shall be final in each case, and shall not be reviewable by or appealable to any court or tribunal."

The law further provides that written consent to granting of licenses must be obtained from a majority of the holders of all the real estate situated within 250 feet of the proposed location, if within one-half mile of a first or second class post-office. Outside the half-mile radius a majority of all holders within 1,000 feet must be secured.

Bond must be given by licensees for compliance with all regulations of the law. Neither women nor minors are permitted to enter saloons; and gambling and free lunches are strictly prohibited.

Not only is the sale of liquor forbidden to any woman or minor, but also to any person whose wife, son, daughter, brother, sister, parent, guardian, or employer shall have given notice, as provided, forbidding the sale of liquor to such person.

Licenses are granted only after a public hearing, where opportunity is given any citizen to show cause why the license should be refused, even though all requirements of the law have been complied with; and no new license can be issued to anyone who has once had a license revoked.

The parts of the law here referred to form only the main lines of the rigid surveillance of the sale of liquor provided for in the new Hawaiian liquor law of 1907.

If the Congress should pass a bill repealing the liquor law enacted by the Hawaiian legislature, and thus leave the liquor business wholly unrestricted in Hawaii, such an act would at once be recognized as a violation of the rights conferred on the citizens of Hawaii to regulate their domestic affairs and to establish their own police regulations.

Both in principle and in fact the pending bill similarly invades the self-governing powers conferred by Congress on the Territory of Hawaii, to be exercised by its elected legislature; it would, in effect, be no less an invasion of the right of home rule than would an act legalizing the sale of liquor to all persons and in all places in the Territory.

When the people of Hawaii gave up their independent government to become a Territory of the United States, they knew that Congress would of necessity have plenary legal authority to legislate on any subject whatever affecting the Territory; in other words, that while the Congress, by the organic act, reserved certain legislative powers to itself and conferred certain others on the Territory, the legal power to legislate on all subjects affecting those islands would still inhere in the Congress.

But the people of Hawaii transferred the supreme authority of their government to the United States, believing that the established principles of this Nation would never admit of its interfering with rights of self-government conferred on a Territory, particularly when an independent country was made a Territory of the United States, for the mutual benefit of both countries; and we still believe that the Congress, in legislating for Hawaii, will be governed by moral obligations and a regard for good faith and will not, knowingly and without good cause, revoke a previously conferred and important power of self-government, even though it have the naked legal power so to do.

It is noteworthy that the pending bill does not provide for prohibition "in the Territories of the United States," nor even for "the insular Territories and possessions of the United States." Instead it is limited to Hawaii only, implying that such paternal legislation is needed more there than in Arizona, New Mexico, Porto Rico, and the Philippines.

I resent this reflection on the people of Hawaii, because there are no facts and conditions to justify it.

As already stated above, the liquor laws in Hawaii are more restrictive than in the average State where the traffic is permitted at all. As to the character of the Hawaiian people and their capacity for self-government, it should be remembered that through their legislature, elected under the Constitution, the Hawaiian people had self-government long before either Arizona or New Mexico became a Territory of the United States; that they enjoyed self-government before the States of California, Oregon, and Washington had even achieved a territorial status; that for three-quarters of a century they have had a public-school system, so thorough and efficient that the percentage of illiteracy among Hawaiians is less than that of the great State of Massachusetts.

The unanimous testimony of nearly 100 Members of Congress who have visited Hawaii since annexation is that it is one of the most progressive American communities under the flag. Upon what grounds, then, can the Congress rightfully single out this one Territory to lessen its right to administer its purely local governmental affairs?

The annexation of Hawaii, as above shown, was secured by the United States under terms of mutual agreement with an independent government as to the degree of self-government it was to enjoy as a Territory of the United States. It is therefore respectfully submitted that any limitation of those rights can be rightfully made by the Congress only under one of two conditions, viz, either that it be shown that the misuse or abuse of that self-government in a given particular is injuring the Federal Government and the people of the United States, or else that it be legislation desired of Congress by a majority of the citizens of Hawaii.

Neither of these conditions obtaining in the case of the special legislation now pending before the Senate, I respectfully submit that the enactment of any legislation of this character would be an invasion of the rights of self-government conferred on the citizens of Hawaii, and it would necessarily violate the moral obligation of this Government to adhere to the spirit and terms of the treaty under which it secured the voluntary cession of the independent government of the Hawaiian Islands.

The Hawaiian legislature, convened in special session in November last, passed a joint resolution protesting against the passage by Congress of any such legislation as the pending measure.

As the elected representative of the citizens of Hawaii I join in that protest, and ask that no right to legislate on subjects of local administration shall be taken from us till it be shown that we are incapable of proper self-government in that particular.

Respectfully submitted.

J. KALANIANAOLE.

ELECTION OF SENATORS BY DIRECT VOTE.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, some weeks since I introduced a joint resolution (S. J. Res. 50) proposing an amendment to the Constitution providing for the election of Senators by direct vote. The joint resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee about when we may expect a report on the joint resolution?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that as yet the committee has not had an opportunity to consider the joint resolution at all. I am unable to state definitely at what time it may report upon it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Is there any prospect of the committee giving consideration to the joint resolution?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. There is always a prospect and there is always a certainty that the committee will give consideration to every question that is sent before it. But, unfortunately, the committee has a vast amount of business on hand. The question to which the Senator refers will be taken up in due and proper time, and the committee will act on it, as on all other matters. There is no——

Mr. BRISTOW. Can the Senator indicate with any definiteness whatever about when the committee will get to the joint resolution?

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator from Wyoming can not indicate with definiteness when the committee will reach the joint resolution or any other specific matter upon the calendar of the committee.

STANDARD WEIGHT OF COINS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury inclosing a memorandum and letter from the Director of the Mint relative to a modification of the deviations now allowed by law from the standard weight of the silver coins of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury approves of the suggestion of the Director of the Mint, and it is recommended by both that section 3536 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the following words: "And in weighing a large number of pieces together, when delivered by the coiner to the superintendent and by the superintendent to the depositor, the deviations from the standard weight shall not exceed two-hundredths of an ounce in 1,000 dollars, half dollars, or quarter dollars, and one-hundredth of an ounce in 1,000 dimes."

From the memorandum prepared by the Director of the Mint it is apparent that a saving in the manufacture of subsidiary silver coin would be effected by amending section 3536 of the Revised Statutes as proposed, and I recommend that favorable action be taken by the Congress.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 7, 1910.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS METHODS COMMISSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. ALDRICH. I ask that Senate bill 6168, reported from the Committee on Public Expenditures, be laid before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Rhode Island asks unanimous consent that the bill (S. 6168) creating a government business methods commission be considered. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to know something about this measure. It has not been to the committee——

Mr. ALDRICH. It was reported unanimously from the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. BURKETT. I should like to know something about it. I do not know what the object is.

Mr. ALDRICH. The object is to appoint a commission to report upon the business methods in use by the Government, with a view of saving, as the committee thinks can be done, from 10 to 20 per cent of the present expenditures by the adoption of improved methods. It is a report from the Committee on Public Expenditures, unanimously made. All the members of the committee were present but two—Democrats and Republicans—in a committee of 18 or 19 members and have given this matter very careful consideration.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Rhode Island if it is intended that this commission shall perform any function that is now performed by the regular standing committees of the Senate?

Mr. ALDRICH. It is not. It does not interfere in any way with any of the functions of any standing committee.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Is it the purpose that the commission shall simplify the public expenditures?

Mr. ALDRICH. To simplify the methods of public expenditure.

Mr. CULLOM. I think we ought to have the bill read.

Mr. ALDRICH. Perhaps it had better be read.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill was read to the Senate on Saturday.

Mr. CULLOM. I was not here at the time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. At the request of the Senator from Illinois, the bill will be again read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. If it is the purpose of the bill to create any additional bureaus, permanent in their character, I should not favor it. It seems to me——

Mr. ALDRICH. It has no such purpose. The effect undoubtedly will be to abolish a number of unnecessary bureaus that are now duplicating work.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, at the last session we——

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is the matter now before the Senate, or is it pending on a request for unanimous consent?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On a request for unanimous consent.

Mr. BAILEY. I will ask the Senator from Rhode Island to withdraw it for a few moments until the Senator from Maryland [Mr. RAYNER] can address the Senate, as he must leave the Chamber shortly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I will withdraw the request, and will renew it later.

POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. RAYNER. I ask that Senate bill 5876 be laid before the Senate.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. RAYNER. I will ask the unanimous consent of the Senate that I may have incorporated in the RECORD some authorities that I do not care to read in full.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the request of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. RAYNER. I will ask, furthermore, that I be not interrupted until I finish the argument, and after I have concluded I shall be glad to answer any question I can. I propose to discuss the bill along constitutional lines.

I shall not discuss the policy of this legislation. Whenever a measure is presented in Congress to which my attention is directed I propound to myself the antiquated question, Is this legislation authorized by the Constitution? I apprehend that this is a question that everyone should address to himself. I have not been able to find any constitutional ground whatever for this measure. No one who has read the Constitution of the United States will contend for a moment that it comes under any of the express powers of the instrument, and the utmost that will be claimed for it, I suppose, is that under the eighteenth clause of section 8 of Article I it is the necessary and proper law to carry into execution the delegated powers. I have searched in vain for any decision sustaining this contention. It is not a law necessary and proper to carry into execution clause 2 of section 8 of Article I, which gives Congress the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, because this enactment does not purport to be for any such purpose. This Government could not borrow money simply to loan it out again. This would invest it with the power of acting as a loan association or a pawnbroker, and I recall no delegated power that confers upon the Government either capacity.

This is not a bank that we are organizing, and therefore does not come within the meaning of the decision of McCullough v. The Bank of the United States, in Fourth Wheaton, or of the subsequent cases along the same line. This does not pretend to be a bill to borrow money upon the credit of the United States. Its title is:

> To establish postal savings depositories for the depositing of savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

In other words, I want to impress upon the Senate in the most emphatic way I can, substantially repeating the language of Chief Justice Marshall in the great case I have referred to, that legislation like this is not the end for which other powers are exercised, but always the means by which other powers are accomplished. It must pass as incidental to other powers that are given. We have not heard one word throughout this entire debate as to the express power that it is intended to execute. The power to create a postal depository is not an express power; the power to lend money to the banks is not an express power; and the power to invest in government or other securities is not an express power. In this bill, however, these powers constitute the end and not the means. If these powers constitute the end, then the Constitution does not warrant them; and if they constitute the means, then I respectfully challenge you to name the end that they accomplish.

It is said that the Government has a right to organize a bank or charter a bank. Of course it has. Why? Because a bank is an instrumentality for carrying out a governmental function; it is not an end; it is the means of accomplishing some of the enumerated powers. Every member of our profession here will admit that this Government would have no right to organize or charter a bank simply for the purpose of going into the banking business. This Government has no right to go into the banking business, except in aid of the enumerated powers. The case that I have cited, upon the philosophy of which all subsequent decisions rest, was argued by Webster, by Pinkney, by Wirt, and by Luther Martin. Three of these illustrious advocates came from my own State, and all of them constituted as great an intellectual combination as was ever assembled before any judicial tribunal in the world.

Wirt, that gifted genius, with an inspired mind when it came to analyzing the profound principles of jurisprudence, formulated the argument that Marshall followed step by step in delivering the imperishable opinion of the court. What was it that Wirt claimed? That the Government had a right to go into the banking business as an end under any of the powers in the Constitution? Never for a moment. There is a mistaken idea like this prevalent here among some Members of this body, but no jurist, high or low, who ever presided over any court, State or Federal, ever gave utterance to such a sentiment.

Here is what Wirt said, and as Attorney-General of the United States all that he claimed, and Marshall never went a step beyond this utterance. Speaking of the bank, he said:

> We contend that it was necessary and proper to carry into execution several of the enumerated powers, such as the power of levying and collecting taxes through this widely extended empire; of paying the public debts; * * * of borrowing money; * * * of regulating commerce; * * * of raising and supporting armies and a navy, and of carrying on war. That banks diffused throughout the country are appropriate means of carrying into execution all these powers, can not be denied.

Now, I ask again, where is the power that this legislation is to execute? I challenge an answer under the decisions. This Government has no right to go into the banking business, except as an instrumentality to carry out some governmental function. Government banks can be created, and banks can be incorporated. Why? Simply because they are, within the language of the Constitution, the necessary and proper means to carry out some of the delegated powers of the Constitution. We could not pass an act of incorporation for any of the purposes indicated in this bill. Why? Because there is no governmental function involved. The depositing of money by the people is not a governmental function. Lending money by the Government is not a governmental function.

What is the object of this bill? To enable the people to deposit their earnings; to enable the Government to borrow it after it is deposited in order to loan it out again. But these are not the necessary and proper means for any end at all defined in the Constitution. It is the end itself, under this legislation, and it is the purpose of the bill, and there is nothing beyond it; and I challenge you to show me the provision of the Constitution under which it arrays itself, either expressly or by implication.

Let us not make the mistake therefore of supposing that this is a bank that we are organizing. I will give you the definition of what a bank is. I read from the best text-book, perhaps, on that subject—Morse on Banks and Banking, volume 1, page 6, section 2:

A bank is an institution, usually incorporated, with power to issue its promissory notes intended to circulate as money (known as bank notes), or to receive the money of others on general deposit, to form a joint fund that shall be used by the institution for its own benefit, for one or more of the purposes of making temporary loans and discounts, of dealing in notes, foreign and domestic bills of exchange, coin, bullion, credits, and the remission of money; or with both these powers, and with the privileges, in addition to these basic powers, of receiving special deposits and making collections for the holders of negotiable paper, if the institution sees fit to engage in such business.

These postal depositories have no right to issue promissory notes intended to circulate as money; they have no right to use the fund for their own benefit; they have no right to discount negotiable paper, or to deal in foreign and domestic bills of exchange; or to act as collecting agents for the holders of negotiable paper. They are not government banks or national banks, or any other sort of banks, and they have no right to exercise any of the functions which go to constitute a bank. They are simply paternal institutions to take care of the people's money and to act as their custodian, guardian, or committee—a novel and original conception in these United States, however well established it may be in other countries that have no written constitution—a design that was never dreamed of by the framers of the instrument; and throughout all the long line of federal cases I call now for a single decision that has ever justified or warranted such an undertaking similar to this either in form or in substance.

This bill, then, simply provides for a savings depository, without any banking privileges, and with no pretense of carrying out a governmental function authorized by the Constitution; and it differs as much from a bank as it does from a post-office, which is the next claim in which, perhaps, refuge will be sought. This is clause 7 of section 8, but it can hardly be conceived that a post-office or a post-road is the same thing as a savings institution. Adhering to well-established legal definitions, and keeping within the range of professional sanity, there is no more similarity between a post-office and a savings institution than there is between a post-office and an aquarium or a zoological garden. Nor will we be able to show that it arrays itself under clause 3 of section 8—that all-embracing provision, and a panacea for all unconstitutional legislation—the power to regulate commerce among the States. On the contrary, the only commerce, if any, that it pretends to regulate is the loaning out of the invested money to neighboring banks in proximity to the post-office within the State, and not out of the State; and there is not a single feature of the transaction embodied in this bill, from its inception to its completion, that has the slightest connection with or effect upon interstate commerce. Therefore, you can ransack the whole Constitution and not find any warrant for this proposed enactment; and, therefore, its authors and advocates, in all the arguments that have been delivered upon the subject, with a single exception that I shall presently refer to, have not pretended to justify its constitutionality.

I do not know what the Supreme Court will do with it, if it should become a law, nor can I permit a prophetic utterance that the Supreme Court will pronounce it constitutional upon some ground or another, to influence me in my action. With the profound respect that I entertain for this august tribunal and each of its members in supporting measures here, I must find the sanction of the law before their passage, and not vote for them in the expectation that some other forum will, after their passage, discover some constitutional authority for their enactment.

I want it distinctly understood that I have not given the policy of this legislation any consideration, because the assumption of its constitutionality—an utterly unproven and indefensible assumption—must be made perfectly clear to me before I can be called upon to investigate its merits. Perhaps some profound student of the Constitution, some great discoverer of hidden and latent constitutional prerogative, will arise upon this floor before the discussion ends and point with unerring certainty to the clause of the article upon whose bosom this contemplated legislation has lain dormant for a century; and until then I reserve my right to question its authority.

I want it distinctly understood before this body that I am not influenced in the views that I take by any of the banking interests of the country. I have not held communication with any bank, directly or indirectly, or any of its officers, in my State or elsewhere, upon this subject; and I assure you that if I was in favor of this legislation upon grounds of public policy and considered it a lawful measure, without asserting any degree of independence greater than that maintained by anyone else in this Chamber, I would not permit all the banking interests in the country to influence me the other way. Nor can I, on the other hand, permit any popular demand that may exist in its favor to induce me to act contrary to my own belief and convictions. That is often the trouble with a great many of us—and I include myself in the number—that we vote for measures that we think the people want, without trying to educate them up to the point that they can not have them except at the risk and peril of our institutions. In my own State I am quite sure that if I could satisfy its intelligent constituencies that this measure finds no warrant or authority in our organic law, that they would not desire me to vote for it, no matter how convenient or advantageous it may be.

This brings me now to the only ground upon which this bill has been placed so far, and it really furnishes the reason why I have arisen to-day to participate in its discussion.

A few days before the adjournment of the Senate at the last session, a brief colloquy took place between the senior Senator from Nebraska and myself, to which I have already referred, during the course of an address that the Senator was delivering upon this bill, and to which I again make reference now. His address was replete with valuable information, and full of the fire and force that always characterize his utterances upon the floor. It was preceded at the last session, as it has been followed at this session, by a powerful and instructive argument upon the measure by the senior Senator from Montana, who is in charge of this bill, and who always illumines and unravels every subject that he discusses, and in all of his arguments upon the subject he has given us a presentation so full of interest and information that it leaves very little, if anything, for anyone else to say who is in favor of the measure.

I now quote this colloquy between the senior Senator from Nebraska and myself, substantially:

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I do not know whether I am in favor of this bill or opposed to it. The trouble I have about it is this: You will admit that we must put this bill under some clause of the Constitution. Now, what clause of the Constitution is it under which this legislation is proposed?

Mr. BURKETT. I will say, in response to the Senator's inquiry, that I expect to refer briefly to that a little later on, but I think the general-welfare clause would cover it.

Mr. RAYNER. The general-welfare clause would cover everything on earth. I am aware of that.

Mr. BURKETT. Well, it has covered a good many things, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. RAYNER. Is that the proposition? You do not put it under the clause to establish post-offices and post-roads, for it is hardly possible that we could turn a post-office into a bank; you do not put it under the clause giving the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof; but this bill is put under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. Some of us want to understand that, because we do not believe—I certainly do not believe—that the general-welfare clause means anything in the world, and I do not think the Supreme Court of the United States has ever said that it does.

A little later on the Senator from Nebraska said:

I am not disturbed by any fear of lack of power that we may have to enact this legislation. As I replied to the Senator from Maryland, the general-welfare clause has been too liberally interpreted and too often relied upon to sustain necessary legislation for the good of the people to halt at this particular time and in this particular legislation.

This is not the first time that I have heard the general-welfare clause of the Constitution referred to upon this floor as a source of legislative power. When I first came to this body and heard Senators allude to the general-welfare clause as a grant of power, I looked upon it as a sort of burlesque upon the Constitution. I thought Senators were only indulging in a little pleasantry when they were asked under what clause of the Constitution does such and such legislation array itself, and the answer came, in a sort of bantering way, "Under the general-welfare clause, of course." I treated it as a species of satire and irony, amusing, but entirely meaningless and harmless. But lately the same answer has come so frequently that the matter has assumed a serious aspect, and I can not sit in patience any longer, if there is any impression amongst us whatever, as the Senator from Nebraska seems to think there is, that we have any right to enact the bill that he is advocating, or any bill of any kind or for any purpose, under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution.

Let me see if I can not, in a few words, relieve the Senator's mind upon that subject, and satisfy him beyond the peradventure of a doubt that there is no general-welfare clause in the Constitution as an independent grant of power, and that no text writer, no commentator, and no court has ever announced the proposition that the Senator contends for. I stand here now to declare that I shall never vote for any legislation if it has no other authority than the general-welfare clause of the Constitution, and I propose now to demonstrate, with precision, I hope, that this clause can never be invoked to sanction any measure that does not come under the enumerated powers of our organic law.

Let me now read the general-welfare clause of the Constitution:

Article I, section 8. The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

Now, what does this mean? It simply means that Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States. If, instead of saying, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," it had said, "in order to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare," there never would have been the slightest discussion over this proposition. All schools and all political creeds agree upon the construction that I have placed upon this section, and it is too late at this hour, I submit to the Senator from Nebraska and to all others who may agree with him, to pervert its meaning and misconstrue its purpose. I shall read only a few brief extracts now, which, in my judgment, forever place this subject beyond the pale of controversy.

I read from Madison in The Federalist:

Some, who have not denied the necessity of the power of taxation, have grounded a very fierce attack against the Constitution on the language in which it is defined. It has been urged and echoed that the power "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises, to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," amounts to an unlimited commission to exercise every power which may be alleged to be necessary for the common defense or general welfare. No stronger proof could be given of the distress under which these writers labor for objections than their stooping to such a misconstruction.

Had no other enumeration or definition of the powers of the Congress been found in the Constitution than the general-welfare expressions just cited, the authors of the objection might have had some color for it. * * *

But what color can the objection have when a specification of the objects alluded to by these general terms immediately follows? * * * For what purpose could the enumeration of particular powers be inserted if these and all others were meant to be included in the preceding general power? Nothing is more natural and common than first to use a general phrase, and then to explain and qualify it by a recital of particulars. But the idea of an enumeration of particulars which neither explain nor qualify the general meaning, and can have no other effect than to confound and mislead, is an absurdity which, as we are reduced to the dilemma of charging either on the authors of the objection or on the authors of the Constitution, we must take the liberty of supposing had not its origin with the latter.

Now, let us see what Jefferson said upon the subject:

To lay taxes to provide for the general welfare of the United States, is to lay taxes for the purpose of providing for the general welfare. For the laying of taxes is the power, and the general welfare the purpose, for which the power is to be exercised. The Congress are not to lay taxes ad libitum for any purpose they please; but only to pay the debts, or provide for the welfare of the Union. In like manner, they are not to do anything they please to provide for the general welfare, but only to lay taxes for that purpose. To consider the latter phrase not as describing the purpose of the first, but as giving a distinct and independent power to do any act they please which might be for the good of the Union, would render all the preceding and subsequent enumerations of power completely useless. It would reduce the whole instrument to a single phrase, that of instituting a Congress with power to do whatever would be for the good of the United States; and, as they would be the sole judges of the good or evil, it would also be a power to do whatever evil they pleased. * * *

Hamilton, who can not be charged with placing any unnecessary limitation upon the exercise of federal power in his celebrated Report upon Manufactures in 1791, which was, perhaps, the first interpretation of this clause, thus speaks of it:

Common defense and general welfare are not to be construed as a distinct grant of power, but are qualifications of the objects of the taxing power.

Judge Story, upon page 661 of his first volume upon the Constitution, uses this strong language with reference to this clause:

* * * Do the words, "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," constitute a distinct substantial power; and the words, "to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," constitute another distinct and substantial power? Or are the latter words connected with the former so as to constitute a qualification upon them? This has been a topic of political controversy, and has furnished abundant materials for popular declamation and alarm. If the former be the true interpretation, then it is obvious that under color of the generality of the words to "provide for the common defense and general welfare" the Government of the United States is, in reality, a government of general and unlimited powers, notwithstanding the subsequent enumerations of specific powers; if the latter be the true construction, then the power of taxation only is given by the clause, and it is limited to objects of a national character, to "pay the debts and provide for the common defense and the general welfare."

* * * The reading, therefore, which will be maintained in these commentaries is that which makes the latter words a qualification of the former; and this will be best illustrated by supplying the words which are necessarily to be understood in this interpretation. It will then stand thus: "The Congress shall have power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises in order to pay the debts and to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States;" that is, for the purpose of paying the public debts and providing for the common defense and general welfare of the United States.

I quote in this connection what Story says in reference to the preamble of the Constitution. The preamble reads as follows:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

These are the observations of Story:

And here we must guard ourselves against an error which is too often allowed to creep into the discussions upon this subject. The preamble never can be resorted to to enlarge the powers confided to the General Government or any of its departments. It can not confer any power per se; it can never amount, by implication, to an enlargement of any power expressly given. It can never be the legitimate source of any implied power, when otherwise withdrawn from the Constitution. Its true office is to expound the nature and extent and application of the powers actually conferred by the Constitution, and not substantively to create them. For example, the preamble declares one object to be, "to provide for the common defense." No one can doubt that this does not enlarge the powers of Congress to pass any measures which they may deem useful for the common defense.

Pomeroy, who belongs to the same school that Story does, uses this apt and unambiguous language in reference to this clause:

Congress has power "to lay and collect taxes, etc., to pay the debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States." Do these two clauses contain two separate and distinct powers, or is the latter a limitation upon the other? In other words, does the Constitution, by this language, confer upon the legislature a general faculty of taxation, and also another general capacity to pay public debts and provide for the common defense and general welfare; or does it confer a limited power of taxation, by restricting the purposes for which taxes may be laid, and confining them to the payment of debts and provisions for the common defense and general welfare? * * * If the construction should be adopted which regards the second clause as an independent grant of power, it would, in effect, be making our General Government unlimited. Providing for the common defense and general welfare includes everything which any government could possibly do; and a grant of power in these broad terms would be the same as making Congress omnipotent, equal in the extent of its functions to the British Parliament.

I quote now a few lines from John Randolph Tucker, who is one of the leading advocates of the doctrines that I believe in. He says:

To pay debts can hardly be said to be a political power. To lay and collect taxes is a power, and a proper power, where its object is to pay the debts of the Government; and as these words "to pay the debts," are indissolubly connected with the words "to provide for the common defense," etc., it follows that these latter words must share the fate of the words "to pay the debts," and be taken to declare the object of the preceding power, and not the creation of a distinct power.

I will close these extracts by citing a few words from an opinion of Judge Rogers in the district court for the western district of Missouri, delivered on the 28th day of February, 1898, in the case of The United States v. Boyer. In that case, speaking of Judge Story's views upon the subject, he concludes as follows:

After a most elaborate and historical discussion of the subject, presenting the different views of the different political schools or parties, he concludes that the "general-welfare" clause "contains no grant of power whatsoever, but it is a mere expression of the ends and purposes to be effected by the preceding power of taxation." I content myself with the fact that the former construction has never been sustained by any court, and the reverse has been held so often as not to require citations to support it; while the latter construction rests upon the theory that the "general-welfare" clause contains no power of itself to enact any legislation, but, on the contrary, the words "and provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States," according to the most liberal constructionist, is a limitation on the taxing power of the United States, and that only.

No case has been cited tracing the power to enact any statute to the general-welfare clause above quoted, and I do not believe any can be. The learned counsel, in this connection, has cited various acts of Congress of a nature quite similar to the one in question, but no number of statutes or infractions of the Constitution, however numerous, can be permitted to import a power into the Constitution which does not exist, or to furnish a construction not warranted. * * *

In closing these references, I make the assertion that neither in the case of The United States v. The Gettysburg Electric Railway Company, in One hundred and sixtieth United States, 668, referred to by the Senator from Nebraska, nor in any other case decided by the Supreme Court or by any other court, has it ever been held that the general-welfare clause was a grant of power, but, on the contrary, all the cases in which the constitutionality of acts of Congress have been maintained have always been traced to one of the enumerated and delegated powers reposed by the States in the General Government.

That this statement may not seem to be exaggerated, I now assert that there is not one single case in all the line of federal authorities where it has ever been held that any act of Congress was justified under the general-welfare clause of the Constitution. In One hundred and sixtieth United States this case was placed under the power to declare war, and other enumerated powers. The act of Congress provided for the erection of tablets to the memory of the dead upon the field of Gettysburg.

Congress has power to declare war—

Says the court—

and to create and equip armies and navies.

Then the court proceeds to hold that Congress has a right, as an incidental power, to commemorate the memory of those who have fallen upon the field of battle.

I hope, therefore, that we shall hear no more in the Senate about the general-welfare clause constituting a grant of power. It strikes me like a discordant note of music that jars the melody of the Constitution and makes the whole instrument vibrate with inharmonious sounds.

I know the Constitution under the last administration was in a state of collapse. Upon a number of occasions upon this floor I attempted to show how it received blow after blow, until it was almost sent staggering to its grave. The predecessor of our present President, whatever else he may have been, was not a student of the Constitution; he did not care for its restrictions, and did not consider himself bound by its limitations. We have an occupant of that office now who is thoroughly familiar with the landmarks of his power; who, with his judicial temperament, will not only hold himself in equilibrium, but proposes to hold in proper poise and balance the checks and safeguards of governmental power. Therefore when he submits a question like this to us it is worthy of our most serious consideration. The President takes the oath not only to protect and defend, but to preserve the Constitution. Now, by the solemn oath he takes, may he preserve it unprofaned in all its parts, and once more call it back to resurrection and to life.

He has never said in the messages that he has submitted to us under what grant of constitutional power he has proposed this important legislation. One thing I feel sure of, and that is that he will never regard the general-welfare clause of the Constitution as an independent grant of power. Such an interpretation as this, while it would suit the heretics who are waging relentless war against the philosophy of our institutions, would convert us into a centralized government of inherent and unlimited functions; would sweep to oblivion the reserved rights of the States; would render the enumerated powers of the Charter absolutely superfluous and unnecessary; would give Congress the right to pass any legislation whatever that, in its arbitrary discretion or from political motives, it may determine upon, and, in my opinion, destroying the autonomy of the States and obliterating the inviolable declaration of the tenth amendment; would make such a gaping wound in the heart of the Constitution that the blood that gave it life would wither in its veins.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the Senator from Maryland, in opening his remarks, suggested that he did not desire to be interrupted until he had completed what he had to say. I want to ask the Senator a question or two—and I am not asking them in any spirit of antagonism to what he has said, for he has evidently given this subject a great deal of attention, but I ask them with a sincere desire to ascertain his opinions with reference to them. In the first place I, of course, entirely agree with what he has said with reference to the general-welfare clause. The general-welfare clause of the Constitution is not a substantive grant of power; it is simply a limitation upon the taxing power. I think that is clear.

Let me begin with an illustration. The word "commerce" in the Constitution has been applied so as to include new and additional things during the history of the Government. It has a more extended meaning to-day than it had, perhaps, when it was first used in the Constitution; at any rate, it is applied to new instrumentalities, new conditions that have since arisen.

The Senator said that this proposed legislation could not be justified under the post-office clause. The post-office itself is a matter of growth. Post-offices not only in the United States, but all over the world, have taken upon themselves new functions and are performing new functions—functions that were not recognized as belonging to the post-offices of a hundred years ago—and this is one of them. Post-offices in practically all the civilized countries of the world, as a part of their post-office business, have established postal savings-bank depositories. The question I want to ask the Senator is, In view of that history, in view of the fact that it is recognized by practically all the countries in the world that the postal savings institution does belong to the post-office, whether or not it may be considered now as belonging to the post-offices of this country as well? In line with that suggestion, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the post-offices to-day issue money orders, which are in the nature of bills of exchange. The post-offices do that without any objection, and the law of Congress giving that power, so far as I know, has never been attacked. Does not the Senator think that the function of postal savings banks belongs as much to the modern post-office as that of issuing bills of exchange?

Mr. RAYNER. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Utah has asked me that question, and I will try to answer it briefly; for, if I should answer it fully, it would take me a long time.

The power that a bank exercises in discounting commercial paper is a regulation of commerce. When banks receive notes and checks and bills and drafts and engage in the business of discounting them all through the United States, they are aiding the Government, in connection with one of the enumerated powers of the Government, to regulate commerce between the States. The placing of a deposit in a post-office does not aid any of the enumerated powers. It is not the business of a post-office to receive money as a savings institution. How do you connect the business of receiving money with the post-office? There is no connection between a post-office to receive the mails and a place within the post-office which is to be a savings institution. What legal connection, what constitutional connection, is there between post-offices and post-roads—a post-office being the place to hand the mail in and deliver it, and a post-road being the place over which it is carried—and an institution where people can deposit their earnings upon interest? Where is the incidental power? Where are the necessary and proper means, using the language of the Constitution, to establish a post-office?

Now, as the Senator has asked me the question, let me read him a few lines from two of the greatest lawyers of their generation. They were arguing the proposition of a government bank, and their argument answers the proposition of the Senator from Utah. I refer to what Mr. Webster said in this great case that I have referred to. There was no contention that the Government could go into the banking business any more than that the Government would have a right to go into the savings-institution business. A savings institution is not even a bank; but, conceding that it is, Mr. Webster, in arguing for the constitutionality of the Bank of the United States, said:

Corporations are but means. They are not ends and objects of government. No government exists for the purpose of creating corporations as one of the ends of its being.

Let me now read what Pinkney said upon the subject. Both of these great lawyers were arguing in favor of the constitutionality of this act of Congress. This was his argument, and Marshall followed close along the line of Pinkney and of Webster and of Wirt. It was argued on the other side by Luther Martin from my State, who contended for the opposite doctrine, as the Senator will recollect. Speaking of the Bank of the United States, Pinkney said:

In the bank, which is actually established and incorporated, the United States are joint stockholders and appoint joint directors; the Secretary of the Treasury has a supervising authority over its affairs; it is bound, upon his requisition, to transfer the funds of the Government wherever they may be wanted; it performs all the duties of commissioners of the loan office; it is bound to loan the Government a certain amount of money on demand; its notes are receivable in payment for public debts and duties; it is intimately connected, according to the usage of the whole world, with the power of borrowing money, and will all the financial operations of the Government. It has, also, a close connection with the power of regulating foreign commerce, and that between the different States. It provides a circulating medium by which that commerce can be more conveniently carried on and exchanges may be facilitated.

Not one of these powers does this postal depository exercise in aid of the right to regulate commerce to which the Senator has referred. The people go into the post-office, and it makes little difference whether they actually go into the post-office or go into some other building next to the post-office or go into any other building. A building can not make an unconstitutional law constitutional. And they deposit their money. I ask the Senate, Is that a governmental function? Let us stop there. I ask any Senator to rise in his seat and tell me that the depositing of money by the people anywhere, at any time, or in any place, is a governmental function. What is the next step? The next step is that the Government takes this money. What does it do with it? It loans it out to the banks. Is loaning it out to the banks a governmental function? This Government has a right to borrow money. For what purpose? To pay the expenses of the Government. It has no right to borrow money simply for the purpose of loaning it out again. It takes this money. It loans it to a bank. It receives 2½ per cent from the bank, and it takes the 2½ per cent and with 2 per cent pays interest to the depositor. Where is there anything that assimilates itself to a post-office in this transaction? Tell me the similarity, the slightest resemblance, between such an institution as that and a post-office. It is a savings institution, and a savings institution is not a post-office. That is the reason I have argued this proposition at both ends. If it was a bank, it accomplished no governmental functions, but it is not a bank. How is it possible to treat it as a necessary and proper means to carry on the post-office? That is the language of the Constitution—necessary and proper means to carry on a post-office or a post-road.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. One other suggestion. One of the things that will be accomplished by the postal savings depository, as I understand it—at least, one of the things that it is claimed will be accomplished—is that it will bring out of hiding a great amount of money. I think it is estimated by the Postmaster-General that at least a half billion dollars or more may be brought into circulation, which otherwise would be hidden away in stockings and bureau drawers, and so forth. But whatever the amount may be, it undoubtedly will bring a large amount of money into circulation.

Everybody understands the profound relation between money and commerce. Commerce can not be carried on without money.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me interrupt you. Something important may escape your mind. Postal orders are merely the means of enabling the post-office to execute its governmental power in the transmission of the mail. Postal orders are transmitted through the mails to enable the Government to execute its governmental powers. But how does the depositing of money in a post-office, which is taken right out of the post-office and put in a bank, enable the Government to execute a governmental function?

Mr. BAILEY. If it happened that the Government had an internal-revenue office in all these towns instead of a post-office this bill would provide for depositing the money with the internal-revenue collector instead of the postmaster, and it simply adopts the post-office without any pretense that it bears any relation to power to establish post-offices and post-roads.

Mr. RAYNER. Because it is convenient.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In making the first inquiry I put to the Senator from Maryland the thought in my mind was that a post-office is a thing which may take upon itself new functions. What the word "post-office" meant a hundred years ago may not be exactly what it means to-day.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In other words, the post-office to-day may embrace more than it embraced a hundred years ago; and we may have reference, in determining that question, to the usages and customs of the civilized world.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. RAYNER. I will answer when the Senator from Georgia shall have concluded.

Mr. BACON. I desire, with the permission of the Senator from Maryland, to ask the Senator from Utah a question. The Senator's suggestion is that while postal savings banks were not originally recognized as a legitimate part of the post-office, other nations have engrafted them upon the post-office business, and therefore they might be recognized now the world over as a legitimate part of the functions of the post-office.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. BACON. The question I desire to ask is this. I have not yet asked the question. Suppose other nations, after having completed their system by having engrafted postal savings banks upon the Post-Office Department, should go further and inaugurate a system of government insurance—life insurance and fire insurance—and should engraft it upon the post-office systems of their several countries, would the Senator contend that that would give warrant for us to enlarge, as a legitimate function, under the Constitution of the United States, of the Post-Office Department, the entering by the Government of the United States into the business of life insurance or fire insurance, to be performed through the agency of the Post-Office Department?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Utah was not contending for either proposition. The Senator from Utah was simply asking for the view of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. BACON. But the Senator did suggest this, and I understood he suggested it necessarily with his personal approval, that as the business of the post-office departments in other governments had been enlarged the legitimate functions of the Post-Office Department had been enlarged by the general recognition in foreign governments of the propriety of ingrafting upon the business of the post-office the business of postal savings banks, and that therefore our constitutional limits had been enlarged correspondingly, and that as this was a legitimate part of the function of the post-office in other governments it would also be a legitimate part of its function in this Government.

I simply desire to know of the Senator whether, if that were true, there could not be an enlargement of the functions of the Post-Office Department under the Constitution of the United States to the extent that it would take in also fire insurance and life insurance or any other department of business, and where possibly would the line be drawn, if perhaps other governments, not having our constitutional limitations, should seek to ingraft upon their post-office departments functions which they have not heretofore recognized as legitimately belonging to them?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Of course I recognize that we may go so far that the proposition may lose all reason. But within reasonable limits—and I am not prepared now to say where those limits are—we may have some reference to what is being done in other countries as pointing the meaning of a word in our own Constitution. As I said in the first question I put to the Senator from Maryland, the word "commerce" has come to have a more extended meaning; at least it has come to include things which it did not include when originally used. It includes railroads, which, of course, it did not include at the time of its adoption.

Mr. BACON. Therefore the Senator argues that postal savings banks are properly included within the functions of the postal business; and hence I desire to know of the Senator if we could not with equal logic, if other governments should seek to engraft fire or life insurance upon the post-office, extend it to those lines as a legitimate business of the Post-Office Department, as well as the function of savings banks?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not care at this time to enter upon a discussion of that particular question, and I was entirely in earnest when I said to the Senator from Maryland——

Mr. RAYNER. I want to say a word——

Mr. SUTHERLAND (continuing). That my question was asked with a view to getting the opinion of the Senator from Maryland upon that subject.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Utah is too good a lawyer to adopt the view that he suggested, and I have looked in his face and watched the operation of his mind answer his suggestion. That is the reason he does not answer.

Mr. RAYNER. I was just going to pay the Senator from Utah the same compliment—that upon reflection he would come to the conclusion——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I will say to the Senator——

Mr. RAYNER. Let me answer the question. There is no more connection between a savings institution and a post-office than there is between a savings institution and the army and the navy. We have the right to declare war. We might provide that the people might take their money into the War Department and hand it to the Secretary of War, because he could use it in case of war. There is just as close connection between the one as the other.

Mr. CARTER rose.

Mr. RAYNER. I see the Senator from Montana has risen. The Senator from Utah would not stand in court, and the Senator from Montana would not stand in court—both of them are too good lawyers—and say to the Supreme Court of the United States that a post-office is the same thing as a savings institution.

Mr. CARTER. No; but with the permission of both Senators——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. In just a moment. The Senator from Utah is simply seeking light, and he thinks he is applying to the proper source.

Mr. RAYNER. I think it requires very little light to illumine this proposition, and the Senator from Utah, capable as he is, will upon reflection, I am sure, come to the same conclusion.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I was about to put to the Senator another question when I was interrupted, and had partly formulated it, but not entirely. I was calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that commerce and money are intimately related. I think it was Mr. Webster or Mr. Hamilton who said that money is the very lifeblood of commerce. We can not carry on commerce without money. Now, may it not be that if the savings depositories bring into circulation a large amount of money which would otherwise be hidden away, they have such a profound relation to commerce that they may be said in a measure to regulate commerce? In other words, if we would pass a law here which would retire from circulation entirely all the money in the country, commerce would be destroyed; it would be brought to an end.

Mr. RAYNER. There is one response to that question without answering it in full. That a bill may possibly do something that it does not indicate or purport to do is no warrant for action, because if you go upon that line you could go through a hundred grades until you come to the incidental power you want. The bill must demonstrate that the method it adopts is necessary for carrying out a governmental power. This money is to go to the state banks, and state banks can not exercise a governmental function.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. But it brings the money into circulation.

Mr. RAYNER. It brings the money into circulation by loaning it out to state banks, and state banks have no right or power to exercise a governmental function, and Congress has no right to invest them with it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The result of this institution is to bring into circulation for the use of commerce a vastly increased sum of money. It profoundly affects commerce, and the question I wanted to submit to the Senator was whether or not——

Mr. BACON. Suppose the Government was to go into the gold-mining business for the same reason—to bring more money into circulation?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not think the Government could go into the gold-mining business.

Mr. BACON. That is true; but it is a fact that the Senator's argument carried to a legitimate conclusion would bring it exactly to that point. The Senator's argument simply is that anything that will bring more money into circulation is a governmental function. If the Government should develop gold mines, it would bring more money into circulation.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That was one of the strong arguments for the United States bank—that by promoting the circulation of money it would affect commerce and in that way be a regulation of commerce.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator persistently speaks of commerce. Of course, he knows as well as I do that it must be interstate commerce before it is subject to the jurisdiction of the General Government. I would ask the Senator from Utah if he thinks that the act of receiving deposits and making a loan bears any resemblance to interstate commerce?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If you increase the supply of money you increase the facility with which commerce may be carried on among the States; the fact that it may also incidentally affect intrastate commerce would not, in my judgment, affect the power of Congress.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senator from Maryland has well suggested that the purpose to be served must be an immediate purpose. You can not go through the various gradations until you serve what the lawyers call a "causa remota." It must not only be proximate, but it must be immediate; and the idea of the Federal Government regulating discounts and deposits, or if you do not choose to call it "discount," then call it "deposit and loan of money," within a State, upon the theory that it might remotely affect interstate commerce, is going altogether too far.

I am not so sure but that the Federal Government would have ample power to purchase and operate a gold mine if it was purchasing and operating it in order to obtain gold to perform its constitutional function of coining money. I express no decided opinion on that. But I do express the decided opinion, as has been so often and well stated by the Senator from Maryland, that before the Government can do anything under what are called the "implied powers" of the Constitution it must find some specific grant of power. That grant of power being found, then the Congress can choose the means of executing it. But certainly until you find the power to regulate the thing itself, Congress has no choice of means.

Now, I will state it in this way: If the Constitution of the United States were to say that Congress shall have power to encourage thrift and economy among the people, then undoubtedly, if we conclude that a postal savings bank is a necessary and appropriate means of encouraging thrift and economy, we would have the power to establish it. But the purpose of this bill, as proclaimed by all its supporters and as asserted by the President of the United States—not the present President, but his predecessor in that great office—is to encourage thrift by guaranteeing the safety of deposits. The Government having no power to encourage thrift, having no power to guarantee the deposit of any man's money, it has no power to create an instrumentality for that purpose; and that is the whole argument against the matter.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Texas has spoken about the power to coin money. I think it is conceded, at any rate the Supreme Court has determined, that one of the constitutional functions of the Government is to provide a currency for the people, and if I am not mistaken in the Veazie Bank case said that having assumed that constitutional duty it was also the duty of the Government to see that the currency was preserved and that an adequate supply was provided.

If that statement of the power of the Government is correct, then the Government would have the power to increase the quantity of money to be circulated through the country by adding to the supply, by coining more money, by issuing more bank notes, or in some such way as that. If it has the constitutional power to do that, why may it not also have the constitutional power to add to the quantity of money by some device of this character which will bring it out of hiding and put it into circulation quite as effectively as would be done by additional coinage?

Mr. BAILEY. Of course the Senator from Utah knows as well as I do the conflict between the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States on the question of paper currency. He understands very well that the court twice decided the legal-tender acts unconstitutional, and finally decided they were constitutional. The Senator from Utah also understands there was a divided court in the case of Veazie Bank v. Fenno. But I waive all that, and I admit it is not only the right, but the duty, of the Government to supply the country with a sufficient volume of currency. But I deny that in the performance of that duty the Government can act on anybody except itself. If it is true that the Government has the power to bring this money out of hiding by enticing it from its hiding place, it has the power to bring it out by punishing the man who hides it. The Senator from Utah would not contend that a statute making it a crime for a man to bury or lock up his money would be within the competence of Congress; and yet if Congress possesses the power to keep the money in circulation after it has issued it and possesses the power to act upon those who are disposed to keep it at their homes in any way they please, then it must have ample power, because, the power granted, all the courts say it is plenary, and it is sufficient to fulfill its purpose.

I think nobody would be willing to say the Congress of the United States could make it a crime if I chose to lock up my money or if anybody else chose to do so.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to further delay the consideration of the bill; the Senator from Washington is very desirous of proceeding; but I deem it appropriate at this time to make a brief statement on the subject-matter which has been under discussion.

I think the Senator from Maryland is entitled to the thanks of the Senate for making the timely and exhaustive statement he has made in opposition to this measure on constitutional grounds, and it is quite important that we should understand his position clearly.

First, be it understood that the Senator from Maryland does not insist that the establishment of a postal savings-bank system as contemplated by the pending bill would be in violation of any clause of the Constitution to which he can refer. It is important to bear this in mind. The Senator does not assert—and because he does not so assert I assume it can not be asserted—that any particular provision of the Federal Constitution would be violated by this enactment. What the Senator does contend is that there is no specific authority to be found in the Constitution to warrant this kind of legislation.

Mr. RAYNER. Let me say just a word. Do not make any mistake. I do not contend for that. I contend that there is no specific authority and no implied authority. This is not a specific grant, nor is the bill the necessary and proper means to carry out any specific grant.

Mr. CARTER. I will liberalize to the end that the Senator may have the full benefit of the statement as he qualifies it. The Senator contends that he can not find specific or implied authority in the Constitution for this proposed enactment.

Mr. President, much has been written on the Constitution of the United States, and many views originally adhered to with great strength have been abandoned. The Constitution itself, although the subject of long discussion, probably destined to be the subject of difference of opinion to the end of time, seems to be, after all, what the framers intended it should be—a very simple, plain document. Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution enumerates the powers which Congress shall have—the power to do various things. I think there are about 18 subdivisions of that section. Section 9 proceeds to state what the Congress can not do. Section 10 proceeds to prohibit the States from doing certain things. If every act of government must be traced back to some specific authorization contained in section 8, then it would be necessary for us to curtail government activities in a thousand general and special directions, if you please, which will occur at once to the mind of every Senator present without recapitulation on my part.

The very building in which we are deliberating was erected without special constitutional warrant. The whole detailed fabric of Government has been established in many particulars without any special warrant of law. Who can find any constitutional authority for the examination of soils in the States by the Department of Agriculture? Who can find any specific constitutional authority for placing fish in the streams in the various States? Who can find forest reserves named in the Constitution?

Mr. President, there is no prohibition on this legislation. But bear in mind that while the Constitution prohibited certain things to the Congress and gave certain powers, that same Constitution created a sovereign State, and in the exercise of an attribute of sovereignty this Government was authorized to do whatsoever was not prohibited which might lead to the betterment of the people and the accomplishment of the high ends of Government.

Mr. President, the question here, and the only question, is, May the Government of the United States authorize the people of the United States, for their own benefit and convenience, to subject existing machinery of Government to an additional use in no sense inconsistent with the purposes for which the machinery was created? We permit the States to occupy the old Hall of the House of Representatives with statues of former citizens of renown in the respective States. It is believed that that is an exhibition conducive of patriotism and its growth. But there is no constitutional warrant for it, of course, more than there is a constitutional warrant for the Smithsonian Institution and its administration.

Mr. President, I hope Senators who hereafter address themselves to the constitutional proposition here involved will answer this question: Is it competent for the Government of the United States, having an established governmental institution with widespread facilities, consisting of post-roads, post-offices, and officers in charge, to permit the people of this country to use these facilities for purposes wholly consistent with, and in no sense inconsistent with, the purpose for which the facilities were created? That is the only question involved in this case.

Mr. RAYNER. Will the Senator allow me to say just one word?

Mr. CARTER. Certainly; I would be glad to have the Senator do so.

Mr. RAYNER. I want to say only a word.

The proposition the Senator states is stated often here. Whenever we are dealing with an unconstitutional act some one cites some unconstitutional statute in support of it. I have heard it often here that we have passed such-and-such a law, and such-and-such a law. These laws have never gone before the Supreme Court of the United States.

I want to read merely two lines to the Senator from Montana, instructive lines, from a decision from the case of The United States v. Boyer, delivered by Judge Rogers in the district court for the western district of Missouri, when the same citation was made in the court and the very question that the Senator asks was answered. This was under the meat-inspection law, and the question was whether Congress had a right to send an inspector to a State for the purpose of examining cattle. We passed the law, and when the law was passed dozens of statutes were cited in support of it, that we have passed such-and-such a law; but when the law came into court the judge who presided, and who is a man of great ability, and served, I think, in the House of Representatives with the Senator from Montana and myself, used this language. He said:

> The learned counsel, in this connection, has cited various acts of Congress of a nature quite similar to the one in question, but no number of statutes or infractions of the Constitution, however numerous, can be permitted to import a power into the Constitution which does not exist, or to furnish a construction not warranted.

What we want in this case is not some law that has never been passed upon by any of the federal courts, but we want a law that has been passed upon by some of the federal courts. These laws, one by one, as they come before the Supreme Court will perhaps be pronounced to be unconstitutional.

In this case a party was charged with an attempt to bribe an inspector. The point was made that under the meat-inspection law you had no right to send an inspector into the State of Illinois. The court held you could not bribe him, because the act sending him into the State of Illinois was an unconstitutional act. This decision has never been appealed from by the law officers of the Government. You can not send these inspectors into our States. About a year ago I went to the Secretary of Agriculture. He had sent an inspector into one of the farming districts of my own State, into Carroll County, and had assumed powers he had no right to exercise. I called the Secretary's attention to this decision. He said his attention had never been called to it before.

You have no right to go into the States and exercise a power that does not carry out some enumerated power of the Constitution, unless that power itself is necessary and proper within the language of the cases I have cited to effect an enumerated power. If the only constitutional warrant—and I say it with the greatest respect and deference, because there are no two Senators in this body for whom I have greater respect—if the only constitutional warrant for this act is the argument that has been made by the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Montana, then we can all assume that it is unconstitutional.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, perchance at a later hour in the course of the discussion of this question, I shall undertake to review the authorities presented by the Senator from Maryland and those to be presented by the Senator from Texas. My purpose in arising at this time has been served by a presentation of the question to be considered, as I understand it; and that I will repeat so that no misunderstanding may arise.

The Senator states that this is not in violation of any clause of the Constitution, but it is unwarranted by any delegated or implied power. I put the question again: Does the Senator deem it a violation of the Constitution of the United States for the Congress, in the exercise of its wisdom as to a course of policy deemed wise, to extend to the body of the people the right to use facilities created, existing, and maintained under constitutional authority, when the use thus extended is in no wise inconsistent with the original purpose of creating the governmental facility or machinery?

Mr. RAYNER. I hope the Senator from Montana, in the presence of the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], will not pursue the proposition that we can pass any legislation here that we want if it does not violate the Constitution of the United States.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I ask that Senate bill 4462 be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4462) to amend section 5278 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. PILES. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has an amendment pending. I have sent for the Senator to come in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, strike out the words "duly filed" and insert "made after an examination and the hearing of sworn testimony and filed in a court of competent jurisdiction to try the parties charged for the offense charged."

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it does not seem to me that that amendment is at all essential. It covers that which may now be done by the governor of the State before the prisoner is demanded to be given up, and it is in a measure overhauling the law as it now exists.

While I am on my feet I may say that this provision which has been reported here simply covers the question of an information and leaves the statute otherwise just as it is now. Under the present law the governor may demand a hearing and he may refuse to give up the prisoner demanded if the hearing is not satisfactory to him.

It was not the intention of the committee to redraft and overhaul the entire statute with reference to extradition. It was simply the desire of the committee to include in the extradition law a provision that a man may be extradited upon indictment, or upon information, or upon affidavit filed before a magistrate.

It was suggested the other day while we were discussing this matter that it did not necessarily follow that a party would have to be in the State where he was charged before he could be extradited; that is to say, that it did not necessarily follow that if the party was charged with crime in the State of Washington, he should have been in the State of Washington before extradition would lie.

I call attention to the fact that a party can not be extradited under the statute nor under the Constitution unless he has been in the State which is demanding him. This matter has been well settled by the Supreme Court in the case of Hyatt v. Corkran, where it is held that if a party was not in the State which charged him with the offense, he is not subject to extradition. It does not make any difference whether he is charged by indictment, by affidavit, or information, he must have been a fugitive from justice, and he can only be a fugitive from justice when he was physically present in the State at the time he violated the law of the State.

So, we have here, Mr. President, in the first place, States which prosecute men by information. There are recognized methods of procedure in those States. The purpose of the committee was to recognize that method of procedure and to recognize it in the extradition law.

Second, we have as a safeguard to that the fact that the governors of the States are never compelled to deliver up the party.

Third, that the governors of the States may demand any showing that they desire.

And, fourth, that the party must have been physically present in the State where he is charged before he can be extradited at all.

There can be no possible injury worked to anyone under this amendment of the law. There can be no possible harm done, because it is a recognized act of procedure in the State, and the governor has the absolute control of it and is not in any sense compelled to act upon the mere showing that can be made under the statute.

Mr. PILES. Mr. President, I have sent for the senior Senator from Idaho, who is down in the lunch room. I do not like to have the amendment disposed of in his absence. Therefore, I will say a few words in respect to it, in order that the Senator may reach the Chamber before the amendment is disposed of.

The amendment as proposed by the senior Senator from Idaho would put the existing law in a much worse condition than it is at the present time. The law now provides that one may be extradited from one State to another State upon the production of an indictment found or an affidavit filed before a magistrate. The proposed amendment provides that before extradition can be had upon an information there must be an examination and the sworn testimony filed in a court of competent jurisdiction. This would, as I view it, entail a needless and a useless expense upon the States which prosecute by information. The examination could be of no benefit to the alleged fugitive, because he would not be within the limits of the State and could not participate in the examination.

I hope, therefore, that this amendment will not prevail, as it would simply encumber the existing law and put us in a worse condition than we are at the present time.

GOVERNMENT OF ALASKA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. PILES. It is the desire of the Senator having charge of the bill that it be temporarily laid aside without prejudice. I ask unanimous consent that the bill be temporarily laid aside without prejudice.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Washington asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and that order is made.

MONONGAHELA RIVER BRIDGE, WEST VIRGINIA.

Mr. ELKINS. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator in charge of the bill pending, I should like to ask unanimous consent to take up a bridge bill. It is House bill 17161. It is merely a bridge bill, to which there is no objection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. PILES. I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for the information of the Senate, if there be no objection.

The Secretary read the bill (H. R. 17161) to authorize the Union Railroad and Dock Company to construct and operate a bridge across the Monongahela River, in the State of West Virginia, and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EXTRADITION OF FUGITIVES FROM JUSTICE.

Mr. PILES. I now ask that Senate bill 4462 be proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 4462) to amend section 5278 of the Revised Statutes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, I dislike to see the bill disposed of in the absence of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN]. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bailey	Crawford	Gamble	Purcell
Beveridge	Cullom	Guggenheim	Root
Borah	Curtis	Hale	Shively
Bourne	Depew	Heyburn	Simmons
Bradley	Dillingham	Johnston	Smith, Mich.
Briggs	Dixon	Kean	Smoot
Bristow	Dolliver	La Follette	Stephenson
Brown	du Pont	McCumber	Stone
Burkett	Elkins	Martin	Sutherland
Burnham	Fletcher	Nixon	Taylor
Carter	Flint	Oliver	Tillman
Clapp	Foster	Overman	Warner
Clark, Wyo.	Frazier	Page	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Frye	Paynter
Clay	Gallinger	Piles

Mr. FLINT. I desire to announce that my colleague [Mr. PERKINS] is ill and unable to be present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Fifty-eight Senators have responded to their names. There is a quorum present. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN], which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 10, strike out the words "duly filed" and insert "made after an examination and the hearing of sworn testimony and filed in a court of competent jurisdiction to try parties charged for the offense charged."

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is not my intention to discuss the amendment further than to restate what it proposes in this, I presume the moment of voting, so that it may be understood. There can be no reason why the amendment should not be adopted. It simply requires that the responsibility of some one shall be behind the issuance of requisition papers, so that a party may have some redress, either in the nature of damages or to hold the party responsible in other ways who files or makes a statement that proves to be utterly baseless.

I have in my mind two instances that came under my notice where parties were taken the full length of the country and brought up in court only to have a nol-pros entered under the instructions of the judge, who said, "This is apparently an effort to invoke the criminal law for the collection of a debt;" and the debt was a disputed item. They had been taken across the continent in order to be told that. Had some one been compelled to put some responsibility behind the charge, perhaps they would have been a little more careful. I am willing to submit it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was the understanding between the Senator who is in charge of the postal savings-bank bill and the chairman of the Committee on Territories that the unfinished business should be laid aside from day to day until the consideration of that bill had proceeded a reasonable time. That is the reason why the unfinished business is still laid aside, and will not be asked to be considered until 2 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. HEYBURN. I think I should say at this time that within a few days, or a comparatively short period, the Committee on the Revision of the Laws will present the judiciary title for the consideration of the Senate, and because of the importance and the character of the measure we would like to have it in the position of unfinished business at as early a day as possible. It will be a long and laborious task, undoubtedly, to present it and consider it in this body.

I merely make that suggestion so that existing orders may, if it is convenient to the Senators and in their judgment wise and possible, be disposed of before that measure comes in.

ASSAY OFFICE AT LOS ANGELES, CAL.

Mr. FLINT. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 2902) to establish an assay office at Los Angeles, State of California.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill.

Mr. STONE. I should like to ask the Senator from California if there is not an assay office now at the city of San Francisco?

Mr. FLINT. There is one at San Francisco.

Mr. STONE. What is the distance between Los Angeles and San Francisco?

Mr. FLINT. Over 500 miles.

Mr. STONE. What is the special need for another assay office so near to San Francisco?

Mr. FLINT. On account of the enormous business coming from the southern part of Nevada and from Arizona, which is entirely tributary to southern California now, and not to San Francisco.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to establish an assay office of the United States at Los Angeles, in California; the office to be conducted under the provisions of the act entitled "An act revising and amending the laws relating to the mints and assay offices and the coinage of the United States," approved February 12, 1873, and provides that the officers of the assay office shall be an assayer in charge, at a salary of $2,500 per annum, who shall also perform the duties of melter; an assayer, at a salary of $1,800 per annum; a cashier, at a salary of $1,500 per annum, who shall perform the duties of the assayer in charge in his absence. It also authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to rent a suitable building for the use of the assay office, and appropriates $20,000 for salaries of assayer in charge, assayer, cashier, and wages of workmen, and for rent and contingent expenses.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELIZABETH G. MARTIN.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill (S. 3082) for the relief of Elizabeth G. Martin.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which had been reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment, on page 1, line 3, before the word "thousand," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-five," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the sum of $25,000, for the aid and support of Elizabeth G. Martin, widow of James P. Martin, who lost his life as the result of injuries received on the 6th day of April, 1906, by being run over by an engine of the Isthmian Canal Commission at Paraiso, belonging to the United States, being operated on the Panama Railroad at Paraiso, in the Canal Zone, be hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the same to be paid to the said Elizabeth G. Martin by the Secretary of the Treasury immediately upon the approval of this act.

Mr. CURTIS. The amendment as printed in the bill is incorrect. I move to correct it by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "five," so as to read "five thousand dollars."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION, ST. JOHNS RIVER, FLORIDA.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1377) for the establishment of a fish-cultural station on the St. Johns River, in the State of Florida.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station on the St. Johns River, in the State of Florida, for the propagation of shad, mullet, and other fishes, the purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FLETCHER. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1378) to authorize the establishment of a fish-cultural and biological station on the Gulf of Mexico within the limits of the State of Florida.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, why can we not take up the calendar in regular order?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to taking up the calendar in regular order, but I have just sent word to the Senator who is in charge of the postal savings-bank bill that from the appearance of things here the Senate is waiting to pass his bill. I assume, of course, that he will want to have it taken up and passed at the earliest moment. I would not want to give unanimous consent for the present consideration of the calendar when that measure, so far as appearances are concerned, is ready to be passed. I suggest to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], in the interest of the expedition of legislation, that until the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] gets here, he allow Senators to call up bills in which they are interested and have them considered, instead of going to the calendar.

Mr. STONE. There is no objection, Mr. President, to Senators calling up bills, but there are several bills here which have been reported from different committees—several which I reported—and they are not very far away from the top of the calendar. It seems to me that we ought to proceed in the regular way, so that we can get those bills disposed of.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I perceive that there is a member of the Post-Office Committee present. I believe the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] is a member of the Post-Office Committee. Perhaps there are three or four more members of the committee present. Is there any reason why the postal savings-bank bill should not proceed to a vote? I am not in charge of the bill, but the understanding was that the unfinished business should be laid aside from day to day for its consideration. Now, the Senate, I think, is willing to proceed, as it has been, to its consideration.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I know of no reason why the postal savings-bank bill might not be submitted to a vote now, except an understanding by the Senator in charge of the bill that other Senators shall have, I think, until Thursday of this week to prepare and deliver to the Senate their views upon the constitutional aspects of the measure. I do not think it would be agreeable to them to have the measure disposed of before they take the proper steps to safeguard the Constitution.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, if there are any Senators who wish to speak on that bill, I, in charge of the unfinished business, did not know of it. It simply seemed to be a position in which the Senate sometimes gets, where it has been considering a bill and is ready to pass it. But, of course, if Senators have informed the committee in charge of the bill that they desire to expound the constitutional or any other phases of the bill, that is sufficient reason why we should proceed with any particular bill or with the calendar, according to the request of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] to consider the bill the title of which has been stated?

Mr. ROOT. I think the bill had better go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made. The calendar, under Rule IX, would really be in order, but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] asks unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the consideration of bills on the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. STONE. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the calendar under Rule VIII.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Missouri? The Chair hears none. The Secretary will state the first bill on the calendar.

PAROLE OF UNITED STATES PRISONERS.

The bill (S. 870) to parole United States prisoners, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let that go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over on the objection of the Senator from New Jersey.

INJUNCTIONS AND PRACTICE OF DISTRICT AND CIRCUIT COURTS.

The bill (S. 3724) regulating injunctions and the practice of the district and circuit courts of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let that go over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over under objection.

ARLINGTON MEMORIAL BRIDGE.

The bill (S. 1630) to provide for the construction of a memorial bridge across the Potomac River from Washington to the Arlington estate property was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill has been read to the Senate several times. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. BORAH. I object to the consideration of the bill at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made to the consideration of the bill, and it goes over without prejudice.

DESCENDANTS OF THE SIGNERS.

The bill (S. 1425) to incorporate the Descendants of the Signers was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Let that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over on the objection of the Senator from New Jersey.

GLACIER NATIONAL PARK IN MONTANA.

The bill (S. 2777) to establish the Glacier National Park, in the Rocky Mountains, south of the international boundary line, in the State of Montana, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that that bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

HENRY W. LEE.

The bill (S. 5018) for the relief of Henry W. Lee was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to Henry W. Lee, out of the funds of the Winnebago Indians of Wisconsin, $2,000, that being the amount found due him by the Court of Claims in congressional case No. 10219.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GOVERNMENT OF HAWAII.

The bill (S. 3360) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 13, 1900, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, that is a long and a very important bill, and I think it had better go over.

Mr. DEPEW. What is the bill?

Mr. KEAN. It is a bill in relation to the government of Hawaii.

Mr. DEPEW. That is a very long and a very important bill. I think it had better go over, retaining its place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over, retaining its place on the calendar.

GOVERNMENT OF ALASKA.

The bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That bill, being the unfinished business, will be passed over.

MISSISSIPPI RIVER BRIDGE AT MINNEAPOLIS, MINN.

The bill (H. R. 12289) to authorize the city of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River in said city, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to authorize the city of Minneapolis, in the State of Minnesota, to construct, maintain, and operate a new bridge and approaches thereto across the Mississippi River, where an old bridge is now standing, from Plymouth avenue north, on the west side of the river, to Eighth avenue NE., on the east side of the river.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

The bill (S. 2325) to increase the efficiency of the United States Military Academy, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with an amendment in line 4, after the word "Academy," to strike out the words "the succeeding appointment may be made from his congressional district or at large in accordance with the existing law," and to insert "his successor may be admitted to the academy; and the corps of cadets is hereby increased to meet the provisions of this act;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any cadet shall have finished three years of his course at the United States Military Academy his successor may be admitted to the academy; and the corps of cadets is hereby increased to meet the provisions of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to have printed in connection with the bill just passed the report of the committee thereon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In the absence of objection it will be so ordered.

The report referred to is as follows:

[Senate Report No. 144, Sixty-first Congress, second session.]

INCREASE IN CORPS OF CADETS AT THE UNITED STATES MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. DU PONT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, submitted the following report, to accompany S. 2325:

The Committee on Military Affairs, which has had under consideration the bill (S. 2325) to increase the efficiency of the United States Military Academy, and for other purposes, hereby reports the same favorably to the Senate, and recommends that it be passed, amended as follows:

Strike out all after the comma in line 4 and insert in lieu thereof the words "his successor may be admitted to the academy; and the corps of cadets is hereby increased to meet the provisions of this act."

The act of March 1, 1843, provided that there should be 1 cadet at the Military Academy from each congressional district, 1 from each Territory, and 10 appointments at large by the President. This act was amended on the 6th of June, 1900, by giving 2 additional cadets to each State and 30 appointments at large to the President.

Under the law as amended the authorized number of cadets is 533, while the actual number at West Point is but 411, due to the fact that there are always a number of vacancies caused by candidates failing to report or to pass the entrance examinations, or by the elimination of cadets who are found deficient in their studies or in conduct.

The object of this bill is to increase the number of cadets at the Military Academy by a slight modification in the method of making appointments. It is proposed that Members of Congress and the President who recommend or make the appointments shall have the right to a second appointment as soon as their appointee shall have become a member of the graduating class after three years' service at the academy. In other words, those recommending or making cadet appointment will each have 1 cadet at the Military Academy during three years and 2 cadets during every fourth year.

The effect of this bill, if passed, would be to increase the authorized number of cadets from 533 to 710, while the actual number, judging from the experience of many years, would be about 550 cadets, or an increase of about 135, which would give an annual average of about 140 graduates. This increase, however, would be progressive—88 additional cadets would enter the academy in March, 1911, who would not graduate until 1915, and the corps of cadets would be gradually enlarged until 1915, at which time the whole number of the additional cadets would be at the academy.

From 1878 to 1898 the average number of appointments to the grade of second lieutenant was 87 per year, while the average number of West Point graduates was but 55 per year. From 1898 to 1907 the average number of appointments was 262 per year, while the average number of graduates was 90 per year; so that an average of 140 graduates each year will not begin to fill the average number of annual vacancies in the army, and will not have the effect of closing the doors to promotions from the ranks or to appointments from civil life.

The extra expense involved for the first year—being the pay and rations of the additional cadets—would be only about $6,243, but later it would be necessary to make a moderate increase in the number of instructors, and this, with other items, would bring the additional cost up to about $15,000 a year, which is less than 1 per cent of the annual cost of maintaining the Military Academy. The cost of maintaining this school is practically the same whether it be attended by the entire number of cadets authorized by the bill, or only by half of that number, as the care and maintenance of the buildings, their heating, lighting, etc., the pay of instructors and employees, and other expenses of the institution would be nearly equal in both cases.

It is to be observed that since 1902 Congress has authorized the expenditure of $7,500,000 for the purpose of reconstructing and enlarging the buildings at the Military Academy so as to accommodate 750 cadets and for improvements generally. Most of this money has been spent, and there are ample accommodations and quarters now vacant for the proposed additional cadets. Notwithstanding these facts, while the navy has a much smaller commissioned personnel than the army, there are 754 midshipmen under instruction at Annapolis and but 411 cadets at West Point. Further, the proportion of West Point graduates to the whole population of the country is less than it ever has been before and very much less than it was in former days. From 1820 to 1830 the average of West Point graduates to the population of the country was 1 to 347,730, while from 1890 to 1900 the average was 1 to 1,251,203.

The following table shows the proportion which one graduate at the Military Academy bore to the entire population of the United States at the various decades from 1811 to 1900, the average number of graduates for each decade, and the percentage which the average number bore to the total population:

Decade.	Average for decade.	In proportion to population, one graduate equals—	Per cent of total population.

[a] Two classes graduated in 1861.

Looking at the matter from the standpoint of salary alone: A cadet who enters the academy between the ages of 17 and 22 is paid a salary of $600 per annum during his four years' attendance at the academy; and when he receives his commission he is still a young man in the early twenties. An officer commissioned from civil life at an age between 21 and 27 years is paid a salary of $1,700 during each of his first five years of service, and he must in that time take substantially the same course of military instruction as that which a cadet receives at the Military Academy; but with a salary of $1,700 per annum instead of $600, and while the expense of the latter's education is larger, his average age being greater, the length of his active service in the army is apt to be considerably less.

The following table shows the number of appointments to second lieutenancies in the army in each year since 1898 from the Military Academy, from the ranks and from civil life:

From these totals it will be seen that in the years covered there were appointed:

	Per cent.
From the Military Academy, 990, or	33.76
From the ranks, 564, or	19.24
From civil life, 1,378, or	47.00

Of the total number of officers now in the army, the percentages run as follows:

	Per cent.
From the Military Academy	43.36
From the ranks	12.97
From civil life	43.67

It will be seen, then, that the number of cadets under instruction is insufficient for the reasonable demands of the army, that there are ample accommodations for the proposed additional cadets now lying idle and unused, and that the increase provided for by the proposed legislation will involve less than 1 per cent of the annual cost of maintaining the academy.

The object of Congress in authorizing the very large expenditures made at West Point was undoubtedly to supply a larger number of officers to meet the demands of an increased army, and, now that the money has been expended, the obvious dictates of good business and economy would seem to demand that a larger proportion of the commissioned officers of the army be educated at the academy.

Attention is invited to the following favorable indorsement of this measure received from the Acting Secretary of War and the accompanying memorandum of the Chief of Staff of the Army, containing interesting and valuable information and figures upon the subject of the proposed legislation.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, January 5, 1910.

SIR: Referring to Senate bill No. 2325, the Sixty-first Congress, which was referred to this department for report and recommendation, I have the honor to recommend that the bill be amended by striking out all after the comma in line 4 and substituting therefor the words "his successor may be admitted to the academy, and the corps of cadets is hereby increased to meet this provision," so that the bill will read as follows:

"Be it enacted, etc., That whenever any cadet shall have finished three years of his course at the United States Military Academy, his successor may be admitted to the academy, and the corps of cadets is hereby increased to meet this provision."

This change appears to be desirable for the reason that existing law authorizes the appointment of cadets one year in advance of the date of admission, and it is believed that the real purpose of the provisions of the bill should be more clearly stated.

I beg to invite attention to the inclosed memorandum of the Chief of Staff, in which I concur. The memorandum explains the purposes of the bill, and I am forwarding under separate cover a portfolio containing photographs illustrating the present progress of construction and enlargement at the Military Academy.

Very respectfully,
ROBERT SHAW OLIVER,
Acting Secretary of War.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON MILITARY AFFAIRS,
United States Senate.

[Memorandum for the Acting Secretary of War.]

WAR DEPARTMENT, OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF STAFF,
Washington, January 4, 1910.

It is proposed to increase the number of cadets at the United States Military Academy by enacting into law the following:

"Whenever any cadet shall have finished three years of his course at the United States Military Academy, his successor may be admitted to the academy, and the corps of cadets is hereby increased to meet this provision."

If this provision is enacted into law it will increase the corps of cadets about 25 per cent, but will increase the cost of the Military Academy less than 1 per cent. The increase would be made without disturbing the present method of making appointments upon the recommendation of Senators and Members of Congress. Apointments would be made from States at large and congressional districts in accordance with existing law, but they would be made more frequently—every three years instead of every four years, as is now the case. As soon as a cadet reached the graduating class he would create a vacancy, and his successor would enter as a fourth class man. The three lower classes would contain as many cadets as are now contained in the whole corps. The size of the corps would, therefore, be increased theoretically 33 per cent, but practically only 25 per cent, because of the number who would fail in their entrance examinations and in their studies at the academy, rendering it impracticable to keep all the vacancies filled all the time. There would be no increase in the army due to this increase in cadets, but of the vacancies occurring in the army under existing law a greater proportion would be filed by graduated cadets and a lesser proportion by appointments direct from civil life.

In order to understand more fully the necessity for this legislation at this time, it may be well here to review a summary of the development and purposes of the Military Academy.

The United States Military Academy was established by an act of Congress approved March 12, 1802, a corps of 10 cadets being authorized. In 1808 the number of cadets was increased to 156 and in 1812 to 250. By the act of March 1, 1843, it was provided that there should be 1 cadet from each congressional district, 1 from each Territory, and 10 appointed at large by the President. This law remained in force for fifty-six years, and under it, due to the increase in the number of congressional districts, the authorized number of cadets grew from 257 in 1843 to 371 in 1899. On June 6, 1900, the law was amended to authorize 2 additional cadets from each State and 30 appointments at large by the President. Under this law (which has since been slightly modified) and due to an increase in the number of congressional districts, the authorized number of cadets is now 533.

By the act of June 28, 1902, Congress authorized an expenditure of $5,500,000—which has subsequently been increased to $7,500,000—for the purpose of increasing the Military Academy in accordance with a plan by which 750 cadets can be accommodated. The law, however, made no provision for increasing the number of cadets, and the purpose of the legislation now proposed is to authorize some of the additional cadets which can at this time be accommodated under that plan. The work of enlargement has progressed to the extent that 260 additional cadets can now be accommodated without crowding. The proposed legislation, however, will only add about half that number. This will be explained more in detail later. The figures heretofore mentioned with reference to the number of cadets have in each case been the authorized number and not the actual number. The actual number in each case has been very much less—in recent years about 20 per cent less. For example, in 1894, when the authorized number of cadets was 371, the actual number was 290; and at the present time, when the authorized number is 533, the actual number is 411. This shortage is due to the failure of candidates to report and to the failure of cadets in their examinations.

The purpose of the Military Academy, of course, is to furnish officers for the army. But of the 4,852 cadets who have graduated, about one-fourth have at one time or another in their careers gone into civil life and become most useful citizens.

President Finley, of the College of the City of New York, in a study of the value of collegiate education as a factor of success in life, gives a list of 18 leading universities and colleges and the percentage of their graduates who have met with "success," based upon data compiled from biographical dictionaries, etc. He places West Point at the head of the list, with a percentage of 5.9; the Naval Academy and Harvard are placed second, each with a percentage of 5.5. The West Point list includes 1 President, 3 presidential candidates, 2 vice-presidential candidates, 4 Cabinet officers, the president of the confederacy, 1 ambassador, 14 ministers, 24 United States Senators and Representatives, 16 governors of States, 17 mayors of cities, 14 judges, 21 bishops and clergymen, 46 presidents of colleges and universities, 87 presidents of railroads and corporations, 125 chief engineers and superintendents of railroads and public works, and many others.

The value of the Military Academy in furnishing officers for the American Army is so well known that it hardly seems necessary to dwell upon it here. With reference to the services of graduates in the Mexican war, General Scott, himself not a graduate, says:

"I give it my fixed opinion that but for our graduated cadets the war between the United States and Mexico might, and probably would, have lasted some four or five years, with, in its first half, more defeats than victories falling to our share; whereas in less than two campaigns we conquered a great country and a peace without the loss of a single battle or skirmish."

During the civil war every important battle was commanded on one side or the other by graduates of the Military Academy. When the war ended all the armies in the field were commanded on both sides by graduates, as were nearly all the corps, most of the divisions, and many of the brigades. In all, 11 per cent of all the graduates have risen to the grade of general officer.

The Military Academy has a world-wide reputation and is probably the best institution of its kind that has ever existed. Between the close of the Mexican war and the beginning of the civil war practically all officers of the army came from West Point. From the close of the civil war up to 1898 the great majority came from West Point, but since 1898 only a small proportion have come from West Point, and a great majority of officers commissioned in the army have come from civil life and from the ranks.

Between 1878 and 1898 the average number of appointments to the grade of second lieutenant was 87 per year, while the average number of West Point graduates was 55 per year. Between June 30, 1898, and June 30, 1907, the average number of appointments was 262 per year, while the average number of graduates was 90 per year. The total number of appointments during this latter period was 2,941, while the total number of graduated cadets was 985. Of the 2,941 appointments mentioned, 1,561 were to fill vacancies caused by legislation, and 1,380 were to fill vacancies caused by retirements, deaths, resignations, etc.

It is thus seen that during the past eleven years the number of graduated cadets has averaged 45 per year short of the number required to fill ordinary vacancies and 172 short of the number required to fill all vacancies, including those caused by legislation. Of the officers now in the army, 43.36 per cent are from West Point, 43.67 per cent are from civil life, and 12.97 per cent are from the ranks.

Some have always held that it is desirable to hold open a certain proportion of commissions in the army for the appointment of enlisted men and civilians, but it hardly seems likely that anyone should advocate running the Military Academy at half its normal capacity and at the same time commissioning more men direct from civil life than from West Point. Congress could never have intended such a thing, and, as a matter of fact, the legislation of 1902 and subsequent years authorizing an expenditure of $7,500,000 could have had no purpose if not to increase the Military Academy to meet the demands of an increased army. In 1901 the army was increased from 25,000 to 80,000. West Point in order to supply the officers must be similarly increased, but not in the same proportion.

Though the navy has a much smaller commissioned personnel than the army, the Naval Academy has an authorized strength double that of West Point, and at this time has 754 cadets under instruction as against 411 at West Point.

Assuming, therefore, that it is the intention of Congress to provide a sufficient number of cadets to insure a reasonable return for the money invested—that is, the running of the institution at its normal capacity—the only question to consider is whether the work of enlargement has progressed to such an extent that the increase in cadets should be authorized at this time or should be postponed until a later date. It is believed to be of the greatest importance that the increase should be authorized during the present session of Congress. If the proposed bill is enacted into law, it will provide for the appointment of 88 additional cadets to enter the academy in March, 1911. These cadets would not graduate until June, 1915. In the meantime, under the provisions of the bill, a certain number of additional cadets would be appointed to the lower classes, so that by June, 1915, the corps would have been increased by about 125, the total number of cadets under instruction being increased from 411 to about 535.

Practically the only additional expense connected with the increase for the first year will be the pay and rations of the cadets—about $6,243 per year. Subsequently, no doubt, there will be a slight increase in the number of instructors, and other incidental expenses will occur, but the total cost by 1915 could not well be placed at more than from $10,000 to $20,000 per year—less than 1 per cent of the present cost of conducting the Military Academy. In other words, the output of the institution could be increased 25 per cent by an increase of 1 per cent in cost.

Without going into the details of the progress of enlargement, it may be stated in general terms that there are now ample accommodations for 130 additional cadets. There are vacant sleeping and messing accommodations for twice this number, but due to the fact that the new academic building has not yet been constructed, a certain number of rooms in the cadet barracks would probably have to be used temporarily for instruction purposes, as has been done in the past. The new cadet barracks, with a capacity of 312 cadets, without crowding, is occupied now by only 51 cadets. If the additional cadets are authorized, the average number of graduates will still be considerably short of the average number of vacancies occurring in the army, and a number of vacancies will still be open for the appointment of enlisted men and civilians.

Very respectfully,

J. F. BELL,
Major-General, General Staff, Chief of Staff.

Approved January 5, 1910.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN NORTH CAROLINA.

The bill (S. 5198) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of North Carolina was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to appropriate $25,000 for the establishment of a fish-cultural station in the State of North Carolina.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ELLA M. COLLINS.

The bill (S. 4781) to reimburse Ella M. Collins, late postmaster at Goldfield, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance and supplies, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Ella M. Collins $821.08, to reimburse her for money expended for necessary clerical assistance and supplies.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPEALS IN FORMA PAUPERIS.

The bill (S. 5836) to amend section 1, chapter 209, of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 27, entitled "An act providing when plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the court," and to provide for the prosecution of writs of error and appeals in forma pauperis, was announced as the next business in order on the calendar.

Mr. KEAN. Let the bill go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I hope the Senator will not object to the consideration of the bill. It has been thrashed out by the Judiciary Committee and is a very important matter.

Mr. KEAN. I think it is a very important matter, and therefore I should like to examine it.

Mr. OVERMAN. It merely allows a poor man to prosecute his appeal in the court of appeals. The law was so construed by the circuit court of appeals, but the Supreme Court of the United States overruled the circuit court of appeals. I move to take it up.

Mr. KEAN. As near as I can get at it—I have read it only hastily—it makes no provision for the payment.

Mr. OVERMAN. It is the old statute exactly as it is with only two or three words added.

Mr. KEAN. The trouble is with the two or three words added. I think the Senator ought to be satisfied with the passage to-day of the bill for a fish-cultural station in North Carolina.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator permit me—informally, of course—before the objection is pressed, to make a statement? The law was passed by Congress to the effect that one unable to pay the costs of a suit should be allowed to prosecute his suit to conclusion by making that fact properly to appear. The evident intention of Congress was that it should relate to all the courts. But a case which had gone through the court of original jurisdiction afterwards went to the circuit court of appeals and then went to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court decided that the word "conclusion" used in that statute did not relate to the final conclusion of the suit in the court of ultimate resort, but that it meant simply the original court. There was the purpose, and the well-approved purpose of Congress to let a man who had a cause of action, but who was unable to pay the cost of the suit, to pursue his case in forma pauperis, and by the construction of the word "conclusion" by the Supreme Court that purpose of the law is defeated.

The sole purpose of this bill is to enlarge the law as it now stands upon the statute books as it has been construed by the Supreme Court, so that one who is unable to pay the costs of a suit shall not only be permitted to pursue it in the court where it originates, but also in the appellate courts. It simply gives him the right to go into the appellate court in the same way that he now has the right to go into the original court. That is the sole scope of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. I suggest that the statement in italics be reversed—that is, instead of proceeding in the absence of a certificate, require the certificate. That is more in conformity with the methods of legislation on such matters. Instead of making it a negative proposition, make it a positive one. The amendment reads:

Unless the trial court shall certify in writing that in the opinion of the court such appeal or writ of error is not taken in good faith.

A party who desires to sue as a pauper must, of course, proceed affirmatively. He must express his desire to do so and give the reasons for doing so. That is an affirmative proposition. That principle should be carried clear through the proceeding and not stop at a certain stage of it and say he may do these things unless the court says he shall not do them. I do not believe in negative legislation.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator will pardon me, if the condition was such as would be indicated by the closing words used by him, his contention would be correct. But it is not that he shall do certain things or shall not do certain things to which the court shall certify. It is simply this: If the court shall be satisfied that the litigant is not proceeding in good faith, the court can prevent his proceeding in forma pauperis by saying "I do not believe this litigant is proceeding in good faith."

The Senator will recognize that in a very large majority of the cases, probably 999 out of 1,000, suits are instituted in good faith, in the effort to obtain what the plaintiffs consider to be their just dues; and very much less difficulty will be presented if it is only in a case where a judge shall certify that a litigant is proceeding in bad faith that he shall arrest it by that certificate rather than that the judge shall be called upon each time to say, "I believe this litigant is proceeding in good faith."

I will say to the Senator that the exact question he has raised was before the Judiciary Committee, and the Judiciary Committee, upon consideration, thought it better that it should be put in the negative.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will ask the Senator from Georgia, Does not this put the burden upon some one to prevent any man from proceeding as a pauper?

Mr. BACON. It does not put any burden, but here is the judge who heard the case——

Mr. HEYBURN. Could not anyone proceed in that way until, if I may use the term, he was headed off by some objection?

Mr. BACON. No. The judge is the officer who hears the case. He knows all about it. He is the judge to whom at last goes for his approval the record which is to go to the appellate court, and he is in a position not only by knowledge, but by opportunity to arrest it if it is a case where the party is not proceeding in good faith.

Mr. HEYBURN. Should not the judge pass upon it in the first instance? Now, a party desiring so to proceed must set forth the facts and ask the court for the privilege.

Mr. BACON. He will have to do that under the law. He has to make that appear.

Mr. HEYBURN. Well?

Mr. BACON. Now, when he fails to arrest it with a statement that he does not think the litigant is proceeding in good faith, it is an acquiescence in the assumption that he is proceeding in good faith.

Mr. HEYBURN. That would be all right perhaps if this were confined to the appellate proceedings, but as appears on the first page it would seem to relate back to the original proceeding. I think the law should be that a party coming into court——

Mr. BACON. That is the law now.

Mr. HEYBURN. I understand that. I have had to do quite recently with the consideration of it. The party, before he is recognized as a pauper, because every presumption is against him, should make that known to the court and then be permitted by the court to proceed as a pauper. Now, why should not that order run clear through the proceeding?

Mr. BACON. I will make this suggestion to the Senator. When a judge has heard a case and it is about to be carried to an appellate court, he is in possession of all the facts. He has seen the litigants, possibly; certainly so in a large majority of instances. He is in a position to judge whether it is a case proceeding captiously, or viciously, or with prejudice, or from any other improper motive, or whether the litigant is proceeding in good faith.

But when the case is first brought—in many such cases a deposit, as the Senator knows, is required—it is impossible for a judge to make a certificate one way or the other, because he has not the familiarity with the case which would enable him to say whether or not the litigant is proceeding in good faith or in bad faith. The law now on the statute book authorizes the litigant to proceed in the original court, and the suggestion the Senator makes does not go to the amendment proposed by this bill, but goes to the law as it now stands upon the book.

I think the statement I have made shows that it would be impracticable to require a judge, before a litigant may proceed in the original court and before he has heard the case, to certify whether or not, in his opinion, the litigant is proceeding in good faith. But he can do that with propriety and with convenience and with reasonable impartiality after he has heard the case.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes. The existing law is quite sufficient, so far as I have had occasion to observe it, and the thing which attracted my attention particularly was that the negative proposition applies to a part of the proceeding and the affirmative to a part. Of course a man must affirmatively show that he is in this position before he can proceed at all. Now, then, he has proceeded to the stage of an appeal. Why should not the same rule apply when he files his petition for an appeal or the necessary writ, that it be accompanied with an affidavit?

Mr. BACON. He does.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; but this does not require him to do that. In other words, it provides that he may, under the first showing, go along to the court of last resort unless some order is made that prevents him from doing it. It is rather an unusual method of legislating.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, all the proceedings as to being a pauper have been certified, and he is now suing as a pauper in the lower court by reason of the order made by the court upon the affidavits and the proceedings below. Therefore this whole question has been passed upon before, and if the appeal is not in good faith, the judge can dismiss it. But if the bona fides are there, the appeal is taken or the writ of error prosecuted in forma pauperis.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; our statute is complete. I have before me the existing law authorizing him to do so. I was not aware that any necessity had arisen for further legislation upon it, because under existing law it is always within the power of the court by an order to allow him to proceed.

Mr. OVERMAN. In a case in the One hundred and ninety-fifth United States Reports this act was construed. The circuit court had construed it as the Senator has construed it, but the Supreme Court overruled the circuit court, holding that the provision only applied to the trial court and did not extend to the circuit court of appeals.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEYBURN. If I may be permitted to make just a suggestion, was not that prior to the existing law of 1892?

Mr. OVERMAN. No. A case reported in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States was carried up under this statute.

Mr. HEYBURN. One hundred and ninety-fifth United States. It was just about that time. I have it not before me. I do not know the date of it. However, I think the matter had better go over for a day. I will look into it. It is one of those measures which is not pressing.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. Mr. President, before the matter goes over I desire to say there is not any answer to what the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] has said about it. It is very proper that a person should be permitted, as a pauper, to prosecute, in the first instance, a meritorious cause of action in the absence of a statement of the evidence upon which the cause is based. But after the case has been tried and all of its features are understood, and he then seeks to prosecute an appeal in a litigation, unsuccessful up to that point, it would be most extraordinary to expect the trial judge to give an affirmative certificate that the whole litigation was without merit. I think the record should be submitted to somebody, to the trial judge, or one of the judges of the appellate court, for a determination of the question whether such errors were made or were probably made as to make it an act of proper grace on the part of the Government to permit an appeal. Otherwise the party may go to the appellate tribunal at any time within the period prescribed by the law, as a matter of course, and it would be an unusual judge, one not to be ordinarily found, who would interpose an objection, with a written statement that any particular appeal from his court was prosecuted in bad faith.

It reverses the order; and I think the original suggestion made by the Senator from Idaho ought to be incorporated in this bill. It will cover every meritorious case that can by any possibility arise. At that stage of the case it is eminently proper that somebody disinterested should pass upon the record to know whether the costs incident to an appeal to one of the appellate courts of the United States should be incurred. It involves a very considerable printing bill; the clerks are allowed very considerable costs, and they deduct their costs from the amount paid by other litigants. So it is practically a donation by the United States Government of the expense of the appeal wholly upon the initiative of an unsuccessful litigant and his lawyer.

There is no use overlooking the fact that many cases presented in forma pauperis are gotten up by ambulance-chasing lawyers, whose business it is to trump up personal-injury cases against corporations. They are decided adversely by the nisi prius court, and there is an appeal. It is the easiest thing in the world to keep that state of uncertainty going for several years by perfecting an appeal, when it is done at the expense of the United States, wholly without regard to the fact whether or not there is any merit in the appeal.

My own judgment, based on an observation of some years, is that the Government has done much for the litigant when it says that if he shall prepare a record and present it to a judge—either to the judge who tried the case or some other—(and I would select one convenient to approach) and if in the judgment of the judge, upon an examination of the record, such errors were reserved as might result in the reversal of the verdict below, the case may proceed in this manner. But this bill reverses the proper order of procedure, in my humble judgment, because it permits an appeal to be docketed and proceeded with—because once it gets upon the docket the court must go through with it—which, upon an examination, may turn out to be wholly unnecessary, and that, too, at the expense of the General Government. That is a degree of liberality which I do not think the due administration of justice calls for.

I believe where a meritorious cause of action exists in the judgment of some disinterested person upon a casual inspection, resolving all doubts in favor of an appeal, it would not be a misuse of discretion to say that such case might be docketed and proceed to trial. But to open the door and say that every litigation that proves unsuccessful should be carried to the court of appeals or the Supreme Court of the United States as a matter of course and at the expense of the National Government is carrying the matter a little too far.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I would supplement the remarks of the Senator by calling attention to the fact that the appealing party would have rather an impaired standing in the appellate court after the trial judge had certified that the appeal was not taken in good faith.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. He would never get that certificate.

Mr. HEYBURN. He ought not to get a certificate where the right of appeal lies. If the right of appeal lies it should be an unimpaired right of appeal that would allow the party to go to the appellate court without an adverse expression on the part of the judge who tried the case.

Another thing. The existing law provides that the United States shall not be liable for any of the costs incurred in that trial. That is the existing law. I think under the circumstances the least we can ask is that the bill may go over. It ought to be considered in the light of these suggestions.

Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas. I do not object to its fullest consideration.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Debate is proceeding by unanimous consent.

Mr. OVERMAN. I have no objection to the bill going over until to-morrow, of course, if the Senator from Idaho wants to look into it.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it go over.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am satisfied the Senator will agree to the bill when he reads the case of Harvey v. The Railroad in One hundred and ninety-fifth United States.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

FISH-CULTURAL STATION IN COLORADO.

The bill (S. 4197) to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Colorado was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to establish a fish-cultural station in the State of Colorado, at a suitable place to be selected by him, and appropriates $20,000 for the purchase of site, construction of buildings and ponds, and equipment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

APPRAISER OF MERCHANDISE, DISTRICT OF PUGET SOUND.

The bill (S. 4464) providing for the appointment of an appraiser of merchandise for the customs collection district of Puget Sound, State of Washington, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides that there shall be in the customs collection district of Puget Sound, State of Washington, an appraiser of merchandise, to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and with compensation at the rate of $4,000 per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, since the bill was reported from the Finance Committee I find that the compensation paid the appraisers at the ports of Chicago, Ill.; Baltimore, Md.; New Orleans, La.; Portland, Me.; St. Louis, Mo.; and Buffalo, N. Y., is $3,000 per annum.

I move to amend the bill in line 7 by striking out "four" and inserting "three," so that it will read "and with compensation at the rate of $3,000 per annum."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ESTATE OF WILLIAM H. MILLER.

The bill (S. 1105) for the relief of the legal representatives of William H. Miller, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will go over without prejudice.

MARCELLUS TROXELL.

The bill (S. 115) for the relief of Marcellus Troxell was read.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, I should like to ask some member of the committee a question. I do not want to object to this bill. I see that it comes from the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, and I should like to ask some member of the committee what, by this legislation, we are going to establish?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Interoceanic Canals was discharged from the further consideration of the bill, and it was referred to the Committee on Claims, from which committee it was reported with an amendment.

Mr. BURKETT. Yes; I see that the Committee on Interoceanic Canals was discharged. I thought it should have come from the Committee on Claims.

It seems to me if we start this method of adjusting these claims it is liable to lead to a great many such bills and to a rather laborious undertaking on our part. I am not objecting to the bill on the merits, for I certainly have not given it time to know anything about it, and therefore I would not doubt the merits of it or even question the amount proposed to be appropriated, but by passing this bill it seems to me we will establish a precedent for adjusting such claims in this particular way, and with the great number of people who are employed there and the great number of accidents that must occur, it will certainly bring before Congress a great flood of this sort of legislation.

I make the inquiry because it occurred to me that there ought to be some way established, I presume by general legislation, by which such claimants can have their claims adjusted. I should like to have the committee make some sort of a statement as to whether they expect to let the claims always go through in this way or whether they have in view some other system of settling the claims.

I realize, of course, that under the law we passed a year or so ago one who is injured is entitled to a year's pay. That might, perhaps, cut out a good many claims. I understand that this accident occurred before that law was in operation. But in any event, to start out in this way, it seems to me, will open up a great amount of similar legislation that will take a great deal of time and attention.

I doubt also whether this is the best way to settle these claims. I am clearly certain that it is not. It seems to me that a congressional committee can not very well turn itself into a court to take up the question of evidence, the question of liability, determine the amount that should be paid, and all that sort of thing. It seems to me that there ought to be some more general way provided for a determination by a court.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BURKETT. I will not object. I wish to withhold the objection until the Senator reporting the bill can make some sort of an explanation.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment of the Committee on Claims was, in line 7, before the word "dollars," to strike out "twenty thousand" and insert "two thousand five hundred," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Marcellus Troxell, of Sutton, W. Va., out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $2,500, to compensate him for injuries received while in the employ of the Government on the Panama Canal.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, this is a bill to recompense an employee on the Isthmus of Panama who was injured by a freight train, which ran over his left leg and made amputation necessary. It occurred before the general law went into effect, which allowed to all injured employees one year's salary as compensation for an injury sustained.

Only a half hour ago the Senate, without a single objection, unanimously passed a bill in favor of the widow of a deceased employee on the Isthmus, who is to receive $5,000 as compensation for the injuries sustained.

The injury was received by this man a short time before the general law went into effect giving all employees sustaining injuries on the Isthmus one year's compensation. The proposed legislation is just, because the man who was injured has, in morals and justice and right, the same claim upon the Government to be compensated for the loss of his leg as other employees who come in and get similar compensation by virtue of the subsequent enactment. I do not see upon what ground the Government of the United States can discriminate against injured employees in justice and equity who received the injuries before the passage of the act.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Certainly.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is mistaken, I think, in saying that we passed a bill to-day appropriating $5,000 in such a case. I do not think we have a right to do that.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Yes; half an hour ago the bill for the relief of Mrs. Martin was passed.

Mr. SMOOT. Then that was done while I was out of the Senate.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The bill had been reported by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. DAVIS].

Mr. GAMBLE. Mr. President, I recall legislation had on a similar proposition about a year ago. A bill was introduced by the then senior Senator from Iowa, Mr. Allison, to compensate for a severe injury to a citizen of Iowa who was then employed in the Canal Zone. The person was disabled for life, as I recall the case, and an appropriation of $10,000 was made. That was before the enactment of the general law. So this is following the precedent already established. I recall that the name was Banton, and I think he was a resident of Cedar Rapids, or some place in the central part of Iowa. This I remember for the reason that he has a brother living in my home town, who spoke to me concerning the legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Martin bill was passed when I was out of the Chamber. The Senator from South Dakota was correct in saying that it had passed.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does not the Senator understand that the Martin bill was passed?

Mr. SMOOT. I so understand it now. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] tells me it did pass. However, I think this bill is entirely different from the Martin bill, and if I had been in the Senate at the time I certainly would have objected to the passage of the Martin bill.

This bill is following out the rule that has been adopted in the past in allowing claims similar in character, where it was no fault of the man himself, and where, if it had happened in ordinary life when a corporation was employing the man, they would have been responsible, and no doubt he would have collected this amount of money. The committee, taking that into consideration, allowed a favorable report upon the bill, but the Martin bill is of an entirely different character, and I can state that if I had been here I certainly would have objected to its passage.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I may state to the Senate, as a short recital of fact, that this man was in charge of a gang in the canal who were blasting, and while he was engaged in the performance of his duties as an employee of the Government, without any negligence whatever on his part, a freight train loaded with freight backed down the track, when he was caught in the space between the dredging engine and train. He was thrown under the wheels and the entire train ran over the poor man's left leg, crushing it until it was practically severed from his body. In addition to that, he received very severe bruises and wounds upon his head and back and shoulder, and sustained a nervous and mental shock from which he has never recovered. The permanent injury he has sustained has not been simply the loss of his good left leg, but a nervous and mental shock which permanently unfits the poor fellow from supporting himself.

His home is over here at Sutton, W. Va. He has an old mother, 80 years of age, dependent upon him. All they have in the world is a little home there in her name, in which they reside, and a part of which they rent at an income of $10 a month.

Soon after this man received his injuries, out of a spirit of justice and fairness to the thousands of American employees who have gone down on the Isthmus to help in this great work, Congress passed a law providing that all employees after receiving an injury shall receive one year's salary as compensation. But this poor fellow gets no benefit whatever of the act. It was enacted after he received his injury. It seems to me that it is very narrow and very penurious on the part of this great Government, when inviting employees down there to carry on that work, to question so small and reasonable a claim as this is.

The committee allowed him, by a unanimous report, $2,500 for the loss of the leg and the permanent injury which he has received, and I hope there will be no question raised about the granting of the relief under the circumstances.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President, the Senator may have misunderstood my inquiry. Of course there are two exceptions in this case. One is that it happened before the general law was enacted, and I will not undertake to gainsay the justness of that law. I helped pass it. I think certainly the Government ought to put itself in a position with these employees at least equal to the liability of private concerns. But that law provides that a person injured in the service shall draw a year's salary. Of course, this happened before that law went into effect, and therefore necessitates special legislation; but the point that attracted my attention particularly and on which I wanted some explanation was that this bill grants a thousand dollars more than the year's salary would have been.

I am not questioning the propriety of a bill to reimburse the man because, perhaps, it was his injuries and others that suggested the enactment of the general legislation; but if we are going to take up a special case and make the amount larger than the general law provides for, why should we not then, in justice, take up each of these other claims as they come along and add an additional amount to what the general law would give? If you pass this special law and give more than the general law provides, are you not inviting all those who may have been injured not to accept payment under the general law, but to come to Congress with a special bill, and in that case are you not opening up a vast amount of legislation? If the amount provided is not sufficient in certain cases—cases like this, where there has been serious injury—would it not be better, if we are going beyond the limit of the law, to provide some general system whereby the claimants can get their rights adjusted?

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Under the rule no Senator can speak more than once nor over five minutes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Very well. The Senator from Nebraska asked for an explanation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection to the Senator proceeding.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I wish to say just a word with reference to the report of the committee which allows this man a thousand dollars more than his salary would have amounted to. The action of the committee was based, not upon the subsequent statute, under which of course all employees injured since that time would come, but it was based upon what seemed to be due the man as a matter of justice and equity. He was getting $125 a month. His salary for one year would be $1,500. The evidence submitted with his claim is very convincing in its character, coming from physicians and acquaintances of a lifetime, who went into the details and showed that since his injury he has incurred expenses week after week and year after year because of his condition. The nervous and mental shock that made him a wreck, trouble with his leg, and the condition in which he finds himself have made it necessary for him to incur quite a bit of expense since he returned from the Isthmus; and as long as we were simply undertaking, in a measure, to do what seemed to be justice to this man, we did not feel bound technically and narrowly by a subsequent statute, and as something of a compensation for the expenses he incurred for surgeons and physicians since his return we allowed him the additional $1,000. I believe that it is right and just to him that we should do this as long as we are legislating for his benefit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

W. B. GRAHAM.

The bill (S. 4778) to reimburse W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to pay to W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., $3,335, to reimburse him for money expended for necessary clerical assistance.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to inquire what are the reasons for this reimbursement?

Mr. NIXON. Mr. President, the reasons for the passage of this bill, I think, are covered by the report which accompanies the bill. A similar measure to this was passed by the Senate at the last session of Congress under the recommendation of the Post-Office Department, but failed to pass the other House. Another bill was introduced at this session covering the same point. I should like to have the Secretary read the report accompanying the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary read the report submitted by Mr. BURROWS on February 3, 1910, as follows:

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4778) to reimburse W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

A similar bill (S. 6682) was reported favorably from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads during the first session of the Sixtieth Congress, and the report made thereon is herewith made a part of the report on S. 4778.

[Senate Report No. 649, Sixtieth Congress, first session.]

The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. 6682) to reimburse W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance, having considered the same, report thereon with a recommendation that it pass.

The bill has the approval of the Post-Office Department, as will appear by the following letter:

OFFICE OF THE POSTMASTER-GENERAL,
Washington, D. C., May 7, 1908.

MY DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 22d ultimo, relative to the merits of Senate bill 6682, "to reimburse W. B. Graham, late postmaster at Ely, Nev., for money expended for clerical assistance," I beg to inform you that in view of the fact that Mr. Graham was forced to pay the amount claimed from his personal funds in excess of the amount allowed by the department, and the further fact that the department could not give him an increased allowance on account of the exhausted condition of the appropriation for unusual conditions, it is believed that this case is meritorious.

Very truly, yours,
C. P. GRANDFIELD,
Acting Postmaster-General.

Hon. BOIES PENROSE,
Chairman Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads,
United States Senate.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, what I wanted to find out was for what this expense was incurred, why there was an exhaustion of the fund, and why did this postmaster need $3,000 more than he was entitled to under the laws or under the appropriation?

Mr. NIXON. If the Senator will allow me, Mr. President, I will state that this occurred during the excitement at the mining camp of Ely some two or three years ago, when that camp grew from a small place to a city of several thousand people. In the meantime the postmaster was unable to secure the clerical assistance with the allowance which had been given him by the Post-Office Department, and he hired the extra clerical help and paid them out of his own pocket. I can say that I am personally acquainted with the facts in this case, and that if there ever was a just claim this is one. I trust the Senator from Kansas will not make any objection to it.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the criticism which I would pass is not so much on the merits of the claim as applied to the individual who received the money, but Congress every year appropriates so much money for just such cases. When the Post-Office Department sends in a claim here for $3,000 it means an increase in that appropriation. If the appropriation which is allowed for these extraordinary conditions had been used, then this claim would not have been necessary. Why is it that this was not paid from the fund that is provided for that purpose instead of being sent in here as an additional and extraordinary appropriation?

Mr. NIXON. At that time, Mr. President, the appropriation for extraordinary expenses had not yet been allowed.

Mr. BRISTOW. But, Mr. President, it is allowed whenever there is an appropriation made. There is an appropriation made for that purpose every year, and the Post-Office Department has the discretionary power to appropriate that money to meet such expenditures. For a claim of this kind to come in means an increase in that appropriation, because the department has got the money, or ought to have it, to meet just such claims.

Mr. NIXON. As I understand it, under the law the Post-Office Department is only allowed to pay a certain rate of wages for employees; and in the mining camp of Ely no one was allowed to work for under $4 a day. The postmaster had to pay this in excess of what the Post-Office Department allowed him to pay for clerical help. The same conditions exactly existed in southern Nevada, at Goldfield, at Tonopah, and at Rhyolite. Claims of this same kind have been allowed by this body. They are entirely just. In this case it was a question of either entirely closing up the post-office or securing employees at a higher rate of wages.

Mr. KEAN. Let me ask the Senator from Nevada a question. Was it not the case at both Goldfield and Ely that the offices were fourth-class post-offices, and therefore the Government could not make the allowances? Then, there came an inrush of miners and others, which increased the receipts of those offices before they were changed from fourth-class to third-class post-offices. Therefore no extra allowance could be made between those times.

Mr. NIXON. That is very true.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I shall have to ask that the bill go over. I shall be glad if the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NIXON] will get a detailed statement as to the amount of money which was allowed this post-office by the Post-Office Department for extra clerical help, and why it was that it was necessary to send here this kind of a claim, for that is what it is. It is an increase in their appropriation, and should have been brought in as a deficiency.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill goes over without prejudice.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, after line 11, to strike out:

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 16311) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the civil war and certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, which had been reported from the Committee on Pensions with amendments.

The first amendment was, on page 3, line 5, after the words "rate of," to strike out "twenty" and insert "twenty-four," so as to make the clause read:

The name of William H. H. Yakey, late of Company F, Thirtieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $24 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 10, to strike out:

The name of John R. Brambley, late of Company A, Twenty-second Regiment New York Volunteer Cavalry, and pay him a pension at the rate of $40 per month in lieu of that he is now receiving.

Mr. McCUMBER. I ask the Senate to disagree to that amendment. Evidence which has been furnished since the report was made satisfies the Committee on Pensions that the reduction should not be made.

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Pensions was, on page 45, after line 3, to strike out:

The name of William O. Marvin, late of U. S. S. North Carolina and Vanderbilt, United States Navy, and pay him a pension at the rate of $12 per month.

CONFEDERATE VETERANS' REUNION AT MOBILE, ALA.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 63) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan certain tents, saddles, and bridles for the use of the confederate veterans' reunion to be held at Mobile, Ala., in April, 1910, was announced as next in order on the calendar.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, let that go over under Rule IX.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution just laid before the Senate, notwithstanding the objection. The question is on that motion.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, it is evident that the Senate is very thin this afternoon.

Mr. BAILEY. The Senate will dispose of this or it will not dispose of anything else this afternoon.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, I should like to make a short statement in connection with this joint resolution, if it be in order. This joint resolution, Mr. President——

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. A motion to proceed to the consideration of a measure is not debatable, I think, under the rule.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Does the Senator move to proceed to the consideration of executive business?

Mr. HEYBURN. No. I understand the motion of the Senator from Alabama is that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; and that motion takes precedence.

Mr. HEYBURN. I have not interposed any other motion. I have merely raised the question that the motion of the Senator from Alabama is not debatable.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then I will not debate it.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us have the yeas and nays on the motion, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution just read, notwithstanding the objection. On that motion the Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSTON. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Would it not now be in order to read the joint resolution before the vote is taken? I call for the reading of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator demands the reading of the joint resolution?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the joint resolution will be read for the information of the Senate.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 63.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and is hereby, authorized to loan, at his discretion, to the executive committee, Confederate Veterans' Reunion, to be held at Mobile, Ala., April 26, 27, and 28, 1910, 500 wall tents, with poles, ridges, and pins for each; 250 saddles, 250 bridles: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of such property, the same to be delivered to said committee designated at such time prior to the date of said reunion as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and Jacob D. Bloch, general chairman of said executive committee; And provided further, That the Secretary of War shall, before delivering such property, take from Jacob D. Bloch a good and sufficient bond for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole without expense to the United States.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, there is an amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs that I should like to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 7, after the date "1910," it is proposed to strike out ".500 wall tents, with poles, ridges, and pins for each; 250 saddles; 250 bridles," and insert "such tents, with necessary poles, ridges, and pins, as may be required at said reunion."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution, notwithstanding the objection. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. If he were present, I should vote "yea."

Mr. STONE (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK], who was called from the Chamber a short time since. With his consent, however, I will vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAY. I inquire if the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KEAN in the chair). The Chair is informed that he has not voted.

Mr. CLAY. I have a pair with that Senator, but I will transfer it to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] is paired with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and that the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] is paired with the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE].

The result was announced—yeas 53, nays 0, as follows:

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, which has been stated.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the joint resolution will be reported to the Senate.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, it is undoubtedly the pleasure of the Senate at the present time to proceed to the consideration of this joint resolution. I did not vote against the motion to proceed to its consideration, and I shall not weary the Senate with a long discussion of the reasons why I shall vote against the joint resolution. I want to say at this time that what I shall say with regard to this joint resolution, or while considering it, will be said in good temper, spoken to friends, on a conscientious principle that is not the creature of a day.

There are some questions upon which all men may have a candid, fair, tolerant, and honest difference of opinion. There are some questions that are at all times open to differing opinions and differing conclusions. There are some questions upon which conclusions have been reached that are binding upon all men under the law and in conscience.

This joint resolution refers in terms to the confederate veterans' reunion to be held at Mobile, Ala., upon three days which are specified, and proposes that the Government of the United States in recognition of that celebration shall loan to those engaged in it the property of the United States in order to carry out the purpose of the celebration. I trust I will not be charged with bad faith in saying that I have inquired this day of a Senator who is interested in the passage of this joint resolution whether or not upon that occasion, under the protection of the Government of the United States, the men engaged in this celebration would wear the rebel uniform. I propounded that question to him to-day, and he answered me in the affirmative. I asked him whether or not they would carry over this property of the Government of the United States the rebel flag, and he said "We always carry both flags." The Senator is present, and I violate no confidence when I make this statement, because he knew at the time why I made the inquiry.

I would be the last man in this body who would wantonly reopen wounds of that war. They were ghastly enough, God knows, in that hour, to appall men on either side of it, and I would not reopen them. I carry in my heart no rancor against the men who fought in the ranks in that war. But I carry in my heart and in my mind a pity for the mistakes of men. All men are prone to make mistakes. It has always been so, and, in my judgment, it will always be so. But when men make mistakes, and especially mistakes so grave in their nature and far-reaching in their results, they should be the parties to keep them in the background, rather than to bring them out for investigation or review.

I was asked, "Do you not loan these articles to the Grand Army of the Republic?" Yes, thank God, we do, because they fought on the side of the Government of the United States, and their cause was a glorious and an honorable one. I speak with all kindness, but with all candor. I have received here ill-tempered, scurrilous squibs from many papers and many pens, because I have dared to have a patriotic opinion and have dared to express it. They have in no measure modified my views as to the right and the wrong of this question. Join with us in letting the issues of that day fade out from consideration, if possible, I would say, from the memory of mankind. I detract nothing from the individual valor of the men who fought against the Union. The record of the great battles of the war attest in letters of blood that the Americans are brave people and know how to fight. But when they divide within their own household, one or the other side must be mistaken. Sometimes the mistake is determined by the courts, sometimes it is determined by the votes of the people. On this occasion only it was determined upon the battlefield.

And do you expect that those whose affiliations and whose support were with the Union will sit idly or silently by and see these questions brought up in this responsible field of action and say nothing? Are men less patriotic to-day than they were in 1862 and 1863 and 1864? Is patriotism a subject of jest in this age? If it is, the sooner we know it the better.

I presume to say to those who are supporting this measure you should not, in the interest of good feeling, support it or any measure like it. Do you not believe that the spirit of patriotism and loyalty to the flag still exists? Believing it, do you suppose that men will stand by and see the Government of the United States made the instrument for the vesting of honorable position upon those who made the mistake? Brave men make mistakes. Because men make mistakes they are not cowards. They are not to be despised because they make mistakes. But the man who makes the mistake must not claim the same credit as the man who did not make it.

I refrain from drawing the comparison which arises in my mind between the spirit which actuated the men in the ranks of the South and that which actuated the men in the ranks which opposed them, because they, too, many of them, were of the South, and I demand the right here to speak without either feeling or incurring rancor. It is my right, just as it is the right of every other man, to speak his mind and his conscience. There is no personal equation at all in this matter with me. I speak for a principle that is as dear to me as any you can entertain which is dear to you, and I stand just as ready to back that principle with the responsibility of manhood as any man dares to stand for a principle he espouses. Let us be candid with each other. You are too brave to admire a man who is afraid to stand up and speak for his principles, whether you agree with him or not. The shirking of these issues leads to wider differences and more disastrous conditions. I would not dream of standing here and bringing up the scenes of the war and thrashing them over for the purpose of creating a feeling of rancor in the bosom of any man.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. HEYBURN. For a question.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask whether the Senator from Idaho was in the war?

Mr. HEYBURN. I did not catch all of the question. I understood the Senator to say he would like to ask me——

Mr. DAVIS. If you were in the war.

Mr. HEYBURN. O Mr. President, that is the stock question of the cheap reporter. It has been rung incessantly. I have had clippings from papers in the Senator's State just along those lines. I will answer it.

Mr. DAVIS rose.

Mr. HEYBURN. I will answer it right now.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Idaho is entitled to the floor.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the Senator represents 264 negroes in his State; that is all.

Mr. HEYBURN. I am somewhat puzzled to know just exactly what that kind of a statement has to do with anything I am talking about. The Senator from Arkansas need have no difficulty in knowing exactly how old I was when the war commenced and when it ended. There are no leaves in my history that are not open to the Senator or which may not be opened by him. When he asked that question he probably had looked at the Congressional Directory to answer it first. The second part of the question was spoken indistinctly, and I will ask to have it repeated. Does the Senator from Arkansas desire to repeat the second question, or shall I have it read from the reporter's notes?

Mr. DAVIS. I said I understood the Senator from Idaho represents 264 negroes in his State.

Mr. HEYBURN. If they live there I do. I represent all the people there, and the Senator from Arkansas also represents all the people in Idaho as I represent also all the people in Arkansas. The Senator perhaps has overlooked the fact that he was commissioned a Senator of the United States and not a Senator of the State of Arkansas. Here there are no State lines in patriotism.

Now I will yield to a reasonable, dignified question, but not to those petty questions which have nothing to do with the matter under consideration.

Mr. President, if there are any Senators here now or when this vote shall be taken who think it is appropriate that the rebel flag should wave over property of the United States, by recognition of Congress, they can vote for the joint resolution and answer for it. If they believe that the rebel flag was furled forever at Appomattox, they had better look to their vote. If there are any Senators here who believe that the rebel flag should be carried under the recognition and by the assistance of Congress, let them vote for this measure; and if they do not believe it, let them look to their vote.

There are millions and millions and millions of people in the United States, North and South, East and West, who have implanted deep in their hearts the spirit of loyalty and patriotism. There are men now, who, as boys—as I was in that day—saw the soldiers of the Nation go forth, many of whom they never saw come back, in whose breasts burns not resentment but love of country and loyalty, not to some faction, but to the great Nation and its flag. Is it not better in this age to teach the children in all sections of the country that reward of loyalty is honor among men? Does anyone dream that this generation is going to apologize to the world for the loyalty of the men who participated in that contest or the sons or the grandsons of those men? Do not dream that you can do it and that the people will let it pass by. They will not.

I have seen neighborhoods in our community thinned down until there was nothing left but the women of the household and the decrepit and the children. I stood by the open graves and heard the clods fall upon the coffins of members of my own family and household. While the roar of cannon and the rattle of musketry might have made a deeper impression upon my mind, yet I tell you that that impression was so deep that no span of years will ever obliterate it or allow it to grow dim. Inasmuch as this occasion has demanded the consideration of this and kindred questions, I may just as well express myself, respectful of the consideration of men, but at the same time with that candor which is due to men from men. I may as well say on this occasion as another that conservative wisdom on the part of the South would seem to me to dictate a policy of contentment—contentment that they recovered their country. They recovered their Government and they recovered all that is great and good in American citizenship by the loss they incurred at Appomattox. Like many other things in this life, those which seem to us disasters prove to be the blessings of our lives. Why can not we, in this hour, with almost half a century between those days and these, dwell in the harmonious contentment that belongs to a condition which all men unite in saying they would not change were the issue before them to-day?

Why not devote ourselves to harmonious action for the upbuilding of the spirit of liberty, the welding together of the great principles upon which this Union of States rests, and not the forgetfulness of the sentiment of the household, but of the rancor and contention of war? Why not? What do they gain—I will not use the term "what do you gain," but what do they gain who insist on stirring up these questions by action that inevitably does bring it up for consideration, and what would you think of men, whose sentiment was with the Union, who would shirk the issue?

I did not vote against taking up the joint resolution, because there never was an hour, and there never will be one so long as life shall pulse in my veins, when I do not stand ready to speak for the Union and the sentiment that held the Union together and the sentiment that denounced the attempt at secession.

Mr. President, I would not assume the attitude or the air of a volunteer adviser of men, but I feel I am justified in making the suggestion that you look to the history of the great men who were patriots, loyal and true, in the founding of the Government and the maintenance of it, leaving out that little block of years which marks the error of a generation, and when you select men to place in marble statuary in places of high honor, do not overlook your Marshalls, and your early Lees, and your Masons, and your Monroes, and your Henrys; and I might name some who have come since. Do not forget them. Do not use the occasion to provoke a sentiment that you know exists. It exists as deep to-day as it did in the sixties. There is some wisdom in that counsel.

I have had thrust upon me, through the mails of the United States, for the last few weeks volumes of stuff that would invoke the criminal law to read on the public streets. Do you think it has sent any terror to my soul? It has been a justification of all that I have said and may say, because it demonstrated the fact that the rancor which would keep those issues alive to-day, by thrusting forward the things that pertain to them, was not in the high-minded, but in the minds only of those who are incapable of decent humanity.

Mr. President, years ago I thought the time had come when these questions would never again be presented; when the occasion for their presentation would not arise. I hope now that the conservative judgment of the South and of those who cast their lot with it in the dark hours in the history of this Government will avoid pressing conditions under the mistaken impression that they will not be met openly, candidly, fully.

I have been told in many communications I have received that England had honored Cromwell; that his statue stood in the streets and by the highways and in places of honor. Cromwell was at the head of the Government of England by the will of the people of England. That can not be said of those in issue to-day.

I think I have successfully avoided the use of harsh terms in referring to men. I have not mentioned men by names. I dare to do it if I am challenged. I prefer not to do it, because the principle is clear-cut enough and well enough known and understood to make it unnecessary.

Those days come up before my mind as I discuss this subject until they almost overwhelm me with sentiments which, if I were to express them, would carry me way beyond the bounds I have set for myself in expressing myself to-day. I am doing it in a spirit of fraternal kindness. I see Senators smile as though they did not understand that a man can be kind and yet fight, if necessary. I restrain myself against violence in expression because I want every word that I shall utter here to-day to stand upon the pages of the record of the Senate, so that I shall never blush to face them and that no man will feel obliged to apologize for what I may say.

To the Senators upon this side of the Chamber the matter will rest with your conscience. I find I must make some exceptions, by reference if not by name, and perhaps by name, and I know that you will give me credit for not doing it in a spirit of bitterness.

The war would never have crossed the line of one month had it not been for certain things which transpired at the beginning. The violation of the obligations of men high in rank and position who had taken upon themselves to support and defend the Constitution of the United States and who had sworn allegiance to the flag, and the forgetfulness of that pledge, did more than anything else to encourage men who would otherwise have been content in their homes to leave them and die upon the battlefield. The example of those men cost hundreds of thousand of lives and thousands of millions of dollars. It was not an irresponsible act upon their part; I mean an act of thoughtlessness. In the Army of the United States there was—educated at the expense of the Government of the United States—an officer holding a high rank who was sent for by the Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States and tendered a high commission in the army, for its defense. He held a commission in that hour, and he held the commission of an officer in the Army of the United States when he stood up and took the oath of allegiance to a rebellious organization.

I say this to hurt no man's feelings. No man's feelings could be hurt more than mine are when I see this man put forward as worthy of a high place in the hall of fame. In that very hour when Congress was setting apart the old Hall of the House of Representatives to receive the statues of men worthy to be honored by their country, the State he represented was not a part of the Congress of the United States, in either body.

It cast no vote at all in favor of it. They can not claim at all that they participated in opening this avenue of glory to men. In that very hour, on that very day, they were engaged in trying to destroy the Union. And then we, in this hour, come in here and propose to waive what? The memory? God grant that we could waive the memory of those days. When we come in here and propose to waive the conditions under which this organization is to celebrate for three days and to extend to them the fraternal hand of the Government by loaning them the Government's property to assist them in doing it, if there is no other voice raised and no other vote cast I stand against it; and I do it because I am as loyal to-day as I ever was or ever will be.

The principles of loyalty do not change. I would not charge a man in this Hall, wheresoever he sit, with being disloyal for one minute. I glory in the fact that all men here are loyal and that they have stood up before this high tribunal with their hand raised to heaven and taken an oath of loyalty. I believe that they are sincere in their hearts, and that they will keep it. I am talking now about times that are past, happily—not the condition of men's minds to-day. If my words find no lodgment in the breast of any man, still would I speak them, still would I be true to the principles that are a part of and belong to my whole life.

It is in no spirit of reproach that I have said what I say to-day. The faith of the pledge of liberty rests not only in the hands of the men who were boys then and are men now, but it rests upon even children unborn. It is no reproach to a man that he was not born in time to have participated in the war, but it would be a reproach to him if, not having been born at that time or old enough to participate, he should stand to-day mum and silent as to the principles for which men who were old enough were willing to sacrifice and lay down their lives in that day.

I ask you in the interest of harmony, in the interest of loyalty to the country in all hours and at all times, to say to the people who sent it here, "Come and take away the image which, though dear to you, is not dear to the American people." Take it away to your own homes and worship it, if you please, and teach your children to; but do not intrude those sentiments upon the American people. I ask you that. I ask it in all candor, because I think it is the only thing to do.

It is in no reproach, and in no spirit of reproach to Virginia, that I say she did not participate in inviting the States to place any statues there. She can not claim that she was part of the spirit that set in motion that sentiment. Now, take him home and make him the most sacred, if you please, of all the gods in your local countries, but do not—do not, for God's sake—start again the spirit which resulted in such horrible times, in such terrible conditions. Do not start it again.

I do not mean that I predict war. War will never come again between the American people. The war of the sword will never come, thank God, in this country again. But in order that there may be that harmony which is absolutely essential to good government let us avoid these conditions.

Do not undertake for a moment to urge that the Grand Army of the Republic, the army of heroes that saved the Union, that saved to the men of the South the right to sit in this Hall, shall be placed from a national standpoint upon the same basis as those who did not fight upon that side. Claim the glory of your own household within it, but do not take it out and parade it and demand, like Gessler, that we shall doff our hats to it. We will never do it. We will respect and honor the individual's bravery and manhood and honor, but we will close our eyes to those pages unless you bring them out.

Much senseless talk has appeared, charging that I was—to use an expression for which an American should blush, except that it is made necessary—waving the "bloody shirt." I am as far in my mind from doing that as any man has ever dreamed of. The war was a very real thing to me. I happened to live upon the border line. I was 13 years old and more when it closed. I had been waiting day after day that I might be tall enough and heavy enough to participate in it, not from thirst for blood, but because I had been taught to love my country, and I love it too well to see it drifting upon these shores of discontent or these shores of personal strife.

I appeal to you as American citizens to send these memories back to the firesides where they belong and where they are appreciated. You gain nothing by bringing them out to be paraded, either between the North and South or elsewhere. This great building is dedicated to loyalty. It belongs to the Union. There is no North, no South, no East, no West in this building. It is the great Capitol of the greatest Nation on earth. Bring no element of discord or inharmony within its walls, either in image or in speech. Can you not refrain from it? Can you not fold within your own embrace things that are dear to you without thrusting them upon those who feel differently?

I hope for such a termination of this question. I do not regret that you have called forth this occasion. I will not say I do not care how the vote is, because I do, because I would like to see every man on that side and this side of the Chamber express the sentiment in his vote that we would push back all that pertains to those terrible times, and that we would henceforth regard them in the light of memories, to be cherished each according to his own conscience.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I am sure, Mr. President, that the Senator from Idaho feels much better now, and I ask for a vote.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on ordering the joint resolution to a third reading.

Mr. BACON and Mr. MONEY demanded the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CLAY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] and vote "yea."

Mr. PAYNTER (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. GUGGENHEIM]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP]. I do not regard this as a question covered by that pair, and I shall vote. I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CLAPP. I vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 61, nays 1, as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, February 7, 1910.

The House met at 12 o'clock m.

Prayer by the Rev. I. M. Atwood, D. D., of Rochester, N. Y.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday last was read and approved.

SWEARING IN OF A MEMBER.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following credentials, which were read:

THE STATE OF MISSOURI,
State Department.

To all who shall see these presents, greeting:

Know ye, that by reason of the death of David A. De Armond, late Representative in Congress from the Sixth Congressional District in the State of Missouri, a vacancy in said office was occasioned, by reason whereof Hon. Herbert S. Hadley, governor of Missouri, duly and lawfully issued his proclamation calling a special election in the several counties in said district to fill said vacancy in said office in said district, and setting the 1st day of February, A. D. 1910, as the day on which said special election should be held in the several precincts in the several counties of said Sixth Congressional District of said State; that said special election was duly and lawfully held in each of the precincts of each of said counties in said congressional district, and that the complete returns from each of said counties have been duly certified to the secretary of state and to the governor of this State; that said returns were duly opened by the said secretary of state, in the presence of the governor, as required by law, and the votes for the candidates for Congress in said district at said special election duly cast up and counted, whereupon it appeared that CLEMENT C. DICKINSON, of Henry County, Mo., had received 16,777 votes, and that Phil. S. Griffith, of Dade County, Mo., had received 12,999 votes for said office of Representative in Congress in said Sixth Congressional District of the State of Missouri.

Now, therefore, I, Cornelius Roach, secretary of state of the State of Missouri, do hereby certify that CLEMENT C. DICKINSON, at the special election held in the Sixth Congressional District of Missouri, in each precinct of each county thereof, on the 1st day of February, 1910, said election having been lawfully called and held to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of David A. De Armond, having received a majority of all the votes cast at said election for candidate for the office of Representative in Congress in and for said district, has been and is duly and lawfully elected Representative in Congress from the sixth district of Missouri to fill said vacancy.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand as secretary of state and affixed the great seal of the State of Missouri. Done at my office, in Jefferson City, Mo., this 5th day of February, 1910.

[SEAL.] CORNELIUS ROACH,
Secretary of State.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the Member-elect is present and desires to qualify.

Mr. DICKINSON appeared at the bar of the House, and took the oath of the office.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, as is known, in the organization of the House the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. COOPER], the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. STURGISS], and myself constitute the House Committee on Printing, and as such are members of the Joint Committee on Printing, which consists of three Members of the Senate and three Members of the House, constituting the full committee. Recently, on the 21st of January, bids were opened, as required by law, for the purpose of receiving propositions to supply the Government Printing Office with material for the year commencing March 1. One week after that the awards were made. A bid which had been submitted by the Valley Paper Company (Incorporated) was rejected. A few days ago a suit was commenced against the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, naming the Members of the Senate and Members of the House constituting the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress as the defendants. On that a rule was issued by a justice of the supreme court of the District of Columbia against the members of the Joint Committee on Printing to appear on the 11th day of February next and show cause why a mandamus should not issue requiring the committee to set aside certain awards that had been made and to award certain contracts to the Valley Paper Company (Incorporated). The Committees on Printing of the House and Senate, constituting the joint committee, have considered the matter, and at a meeting this morning action was taken directing me, so far as the House is concerned, to offer the preamble and resolution that I hold in my hand. We are of the opinion that should we appear in court and answer that proceeding without first obtaining the instruction of the House, we would be guilty of a breach of privilege and liable to censure, so that, Mr. Speaker, I offer the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers the following preamble and resolution, which the Clerk will report:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 371.

Whereas ALLEN F. COOPER, GEORGE C. STURGISS, and DAVID E. FINLEY, Members of the House of Representatives, and constituting the Committee on Printing, and along with three members of the Senate, constituting the Joint Committee on Printing, have at the instance of the Valley Paper Company (Incorporated), plaintiffs, been sued in the supreme court of the District of Columbia as members of the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, calling in question their action as members of such joint committee in rejecting the proposals of the said Valley Paper Company (Incorporated) for furnishing paper for public printing and binding for the period from March 1, 1910, to February 28, 1911, as was done by said Joint Committee on Printing of Congress at the present session of Congress; and

Whereas it is sought by the said plaintiffs or petitioners that a writ of mandamus be issued and directed against said members of the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, to wit, the three members of the Senate, who, together with the three Members of the House above mentioned, constitute the said joint committee, commanding them to withdraw awards which have heretofore been made and to award said contracts to the plaintiffs; and

Whereas the following rule to show cause has been issued by Mr. Justice Wright in the supreme court of the District of Columbia, to wit:

In the supreme court of the District of Columbia.

THE VALLEY PAPER COMPANY (INC.), Plaintiff, v. THE JOINT COMMITTEE ON PRINTING OF CONGRESS, composed of REED SMOOT, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr., DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, GEORGE C. STURGISS, ALLEN F. COOPER, and DAVID E. FINLEY, Respondents. | At law, No. —.

RULE TO SHOW CAUSE.

Upon consideration of the petition of Valley Paper Company filed herein this 2d day of February, 1910, it is by the court this 2d day of February, 1910, ordered that the respondents, the said REED SMOOT, JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr., DUNCAN U. FLETCHER, GEORGE C. STURGISS, ALLEN F. COOPER, and DAVID E. FINLEY, members of the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, show cause, if any they may have, on or before the 11th day of February, 1910, at 10 o'clock a. m., why a writ of mandamus should not be issued as prayed in said petition; provided a copy of said petition and this rule be served upon said respondents, members of the Joint Committee on Printing of Congress, on or before the 7th day of February, 1910.

WRIGHT, Justice.

J. R. YOUNG, Clerk.
By H. BINGHAM,
Assistant Clerk.

Resolved, That it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of the House of Representatives to inquire and report what action the House of Representatives should take in the premises, and particularly in the matter of instructing the said ALLEN F. COOPER, GEORGE C. STURGISS, and DAVID E. FINLEY as to the course they should pursue in the premises.

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, this is in accordance with the instruction of my colleagues on the committee. We are of the opinion that a Member of Congress can not waive his privilege as a Member of Congress, that if he should do so without first obtaining permission of the House he would lay himself liable to censure by the House. So that we have thought it best, we have thought it the only course open to us, to come to the House and submit the matter to the House and receive the instructions of the House.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?

Mr. FINLEY. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. I would like to know what privilege the gentleman's committee thinks would be waived if members of the committee on the part of the House appear and show cause why the writ of mandamus should not issue?

Mr. FINLEY. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the precedents are numerous that an officer of the House can not have a writ of this character issued against him. It has been attempted more than once, and in the British Parliament the rule that I have cited holds good. This is the first time in the history of the Government that a committee of Congress has been used. So that the question is, if the action of Congress or the action of a committee of Congress or a Member of Congress, can be called in question by any court in all the land, when a committee of Congress or a Member of Congress acts in that capacity, then the distinction that is fundamental in the law of the land, defining the three departments of the Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial, will be broken down.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me one question further. I know of no provision in the Constitution of the United States that protects a Member of the House from being sued, except as to matters that relate to his personal conduct, such as being privileged from arrest while in attendance upon the sessions, and perhaps he is entitled to protection on account of anything he may say or do in a legislative way. But if I am mistaken the gentleman will correct me. I understand this Joint Committee on Printing has undertaken to let contracts.

Mr. FINLEY. Under the law?

Mr. KEIFER. As authorized by law.

Mr. FINLEY. That is correct.

Mr. KEIFER. I do not understand that to answer to a court in a case like this as to whether they have done their duty as parties to a contract under the law is waiving any privilege as a mere Member of the House of Representatives. As to that there may be precedents, but I do not remember any, and I think the question has been gone over heretofore. I have no objection to the gentleman's resolution being adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FINLEY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. NORRIS. I did not quite get it when the Clerk read the resolution; but what date has been fixed upon by the court for the committee to appear?

Mr. FINLEY. On the 11th day of February.

Mr. NORRIS. And the gentleman's resolution does not give the Committee on the Judiciary any instructions as to reporting prior to that date?

Mr. FINLEY. The commitee is satisfied that the Committee on the Judiciary will act promptly.

Mr. NORRIS. But there might be this danger: That if the Committee on the Judiciary fail to act promptly the day might pass by.

Mr. FINLEY. We have no fears on that score. Mr. Speaker, I want to say in answer to the gentleman from Ohio that here is a committee of Congress that has performed its duties, or attempted to perform its duties, as such. Now, that committee has been sued because of its acts in the performance of its duties as a committee of Congress. This is the first time in the history of this country that a committee has been sued, and I trust it will be the last time.

Mr. KEIFER. If the gentleman will allow me, I may be mistaken—I never heard of the suit before I came in this morning—but I understand that the suit brought does not attack the duty of the Members of this House as Members or as a committee of Congress at all, but it simply undertakes to inquire whether or not a committee of Congress that is authorized by law to make the contract with outside parties have done their duty as members of that contract committee, if you please.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman from Ohio think that the members of the committee are acting as Members of Congress or as officers of the Government?

Mr. KEIFER. The committee is authorized by law to make contracts.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They must be acting as Members of Congress or as officers of the Government in some other capacity, and they can not be acting in some other capacity, because they could not hold some other office.

Mr. KEIFER. Oh, that question was thrashed out many years ago when a suit was brought by a humble homesteader out in Utah against Carl Schurz, as Secretary of the Interior, to require him to deliver to the homesteader a patent for land. The Secretary set up the doctrine that the Supreme Court had no right to order the delivery of a patent to that man, but the Supreme Court issued the order and required him to deliver the patent. That court went over all that doctrine in that case.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit me, there is an earlier case, in which John Marshall held that although he could issue a subpœna to the President of the United States, he had no power to compel him to obey it. That was the celebrated Aaron Burr case.

Mr. KEIFER. That is very true.

Mr. FITZGERALD. So there may be some difference even in this case.

Mr. KEIFER. There is no analogy between that and the question whether the members of the Joint Printing Committee may be sued to inquire into their conduct in making a contract they are authorized by law to make, and not because of anything they as a committee are to report to Congress.

Mr. CLAYTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to suggest that the proceedings of the court affects the dignity and the independency of the House and Senate, the independency of the legislative department of the Government from the judicial. And it strikes me that this committee of the House and Senate, being a joint committee of the two Houses of Congress, the proceedings against the members of the committee are based upon the theory that those members are officers within the meaning of the Constitution. Now, my offhand opinion is that they are not officers, but they are a committee, composed of Members of the House of Representatives as such and Members of the Senate as such; and, if they are, they can not be officers; and not being officers, the mandamus will not lie against them. I do not recall any case similar to the one now presented to the House, but a question did arise several years ago which was, in some respects, analogous to the one now presented. You will remember that the Hawaiian Commission was appointed of Members of the Senate and the House; that is, the commission was composed of Senators as such and Representatives as such—that is my recollection—and the question was raised as to whether or not they were "officers." The matter was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary of this House, just as the gentleman now seeks to have this question referred to the same committee, for the purpose of ascertaining the legal status of that commission. That resolution was adopted, and the question was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. Mr. David B. Henderson, afterwards Speaker of this House, was chairman of that committee, and his committee reported unanimously and in effect that that commission, being composed of Senators and Representatives, was in the nature of a committee of Senators as such and Representatives as such, and were not officers. It may be that will be the judgment of the Committee on the Judiciary in this case. I think that, following this case, the gentleman from South Carolina and his committee have pursued an eminently proper course in suggesting this resolution here.

I do not agree with the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. KEIFER] that a member of any committee appointed by this House would be treating the House with proper respect if he should rush into court and answer a suit against him as a member of such committee without having first called the attention of the House to the suit, which can not be other than an attack upon the independency and rights of this House to appoint and control its own committees. The House must necessarily employ many agencies to discharge functions necessary for the performance of the full duties of the House, and many times it may be said that the business imposed upon such agents or agencies is merely ministerial or executive, but such duties are inseparably connected with the proper performance of the whole functions of this House. Here in this case the House must have printing done; it is a necessary part of the proper conduct of the business of the House; and so, likewise, must the Senate have printing done; it is a necessary part of the proper conduct of the business of the Senate. Of course it was merely for convenience that a plan has been provided for a standing joint committee, and, without investigation, it seems to me that the courts can not interfere with freedom of action in this regard by the House and the Senate. This committee can not be a part of the executive department of the Government. No one would contend that, I think. The Members of the House are merely instrumentalities serving for the proper legislative convenience of the two Houses of Congress. Without saying more, Mr. Speaker, let me add one word, that I believe that the gentleman from South Carolina and his associates would have committed a breach of propriety, if not of any positive rule, possibly a breach of the privilege of membership of the House—and that I have not investigated—if they had pursued any course other than the course they have here pursued, and from every standpoint, ethical and otherwise, this resolution is proper, and I trust that the House will adopt it without hesitation.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to say that the gentleman who has just taken his seat utterly misunderstood me if he understood that I opposed this resolution. On the contrary, I said it was proper, and that I was in favor of its adoption, but I questioned whether or not the members of the joint committee were officers, and in that I agree with the gentleman. I also questioned whether an effort was being made to have a writ of mandamus issued against them in their capacity as committeemen of Congress in the discharge of a legislative duty. As I understand it, they are sued because, by law, they are transformed into a body of men who are to make binding contracts with third parties outside, and in that respect I suppose the court might look into the question whether they had proceeded according to law.

Mr. CLAYTON. From a parliamentary and ethical standpoint I do not doubt that the position of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FINLEY] is correct. He ought to have first submitted this question to the House, because it affects the dignity and independency of both Houses, and he and the other members of his committee would not have treated this House with proper respect if they went to the court and made answer without first consulting this House, whose creature they are in part.

Mr. KEIFER. I agree with the gentleman as to that.

Mr. FINLEY. In volume 3, page 1123, of Hinds's Precedents, section 2675:

> In the case of Kilbourn v. Thompson the court affirmed the immunity of Members of the House from prosecution on account of their action in a case of alleged contempt.
> The constitutional privilege as to "any speech or debate" applies generally to "things done in a session of the House by one of its Members in relation to the business before it."

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to make this suggestion: It seems to me that the resolution is drawn in most appropriate and temperate language, and that the House almost unanimously concurs in the propriety of its passage. Does not the gentleman think it would be better now not to debate the question upon which we are asking a report from the committee?

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Speaker, I will state to the gentleman that debate has been limited so far as I know and as far as I can control it. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

UNANIMOUS CONSENT CALENDAR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I call for order.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order. While the House is coming to order the Chair desires to say that the Unanimous Consent Calendar, in the opinion of the Chair, is a most important one. Under former rules of the House the Chair, as a Member of the House, viséed the requests for unanimous consent, and exercised his privilege as a Member in not recognizing for unanimous consent where he felt assured that the matter ought not to be treated by unanimous consent. Now it is up to the House, and the Chair suggests, especially on this calendar, that the House should be in order and that each Member should pay attention. The Clerk will call the calendar.

WILMINGTON HARBOR, CALIFORNIA.

The first business was House joint resolution 110, directing the Secretary of War to deepen the entrance to Wilmington Harbor, California, to 24 feet.

The SPEAKER. The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 110) is amended by a substitute, and without objection the Clerk will read the substitute.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:
> "Resolved, etc., That the balance unexpended of appropriation heretofore made for improvement or maintenance of improvement of harbor at Wilmington, Cal., be, and the same hereby is, made available for the further improvement of the entrance to said harbor by dredging to a depth of 24 feet at mean low water within the present project limits.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, has that resolution gone to a committee; and if so, what is the report?

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to have an explanation from the gentleman who introduced the resolution showing why this matter is not carried in the river and harbor bill.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I have asked a question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not informed, and did not know that such a resolution was upon the calendar.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Has it been reported by a committee?

The SPEAKER. The Chair takes it for granted that it has been, otherwise it could not be on the calendar. The Chair is informed that it is reported by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Mr. Speaker, the reason why this is not included in the bill we are now framing is because of the necessity for this work to be done at once. I will state briefly the conditions. In Wilmington there is a project in progress to deepen the harbor to 24 feet, including a turning basin of 1,600 feet in diameter. The entrance to that harbor under that project was constructed to a depth of only 20 feet. Work has already been completed under that project, except the turning basin, which, as I said before, was to be 1,600 feet in diameter. That turning basin, under that project, has been completed with the exception of a core in the center, so that now a ship can turn in that turning basin. The difficulty with the harbor now is that at the entrance it is only 20 feet in depth, while the rest of the harbor is 24 feet in depth. Inasmuch as the turning basin can now be used in its present condition, it is desired now to use the remaining money appropriated for that purpose to deepen the entrance to the harbor to 24 feet, because recently ships have arrived at that port drawing more than 20 feet and could not enter the harbor because of the shallow depth of the entrance.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman if there has been a survey of this project.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Yes.

Mr. MACON. And a report made upon it?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. A favorable report.

Mr. MACON. How much will it cost?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Well, the money has already been appropriated. We ask simply to divert it from the turning basin to the deepening of the entrance to the harbor.

Mr. MACON. It is simply to make immediately available an appropriation already made?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. That is right.

Mr. MACON. If that is all, I will not object.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I will renew the reservation. Do I understand the gentleman to say that this is a diversion of a fund from one purpose to another?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. No; it is in the same harbor. The project there contemplated deepening the entrance to the harbor to 20 feet and 24 feet inside the harbor, including a turning basin of 1,600 feet in diameter.

That work has already been done, except taking out a core in the center of the turning basin. Ships now turn in that basin even with the core there, but ships have recently called at that port drawing more than 20 feet and could not enter because of the shallow entrance, and now it is proposed, in the interest of commerce, to stop the further construction of the turning basin and to divert the unexpended balance to deepen the entrance to 24 feet and make it similar to the rest of the harbor.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then it does contemplate a change from the plan under which the original appropriation was made?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Yes; but there is an authorization already made by Congress to deepen the entrance of this harbor to that depth. That has been authorized and agreed upon by the board of engineers.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. What is the amount?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Between $30,000 and $40,000 which is sought to be diverted for this purpose.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will an additional amount be made necessary to complete the turning basin?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Certainly. We can not dig out the core of the turning basin unless more funds are appropriated in the future for that purpose, if this amount is now used to deepen the entrance to the harbor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much did the gentleman say is available for this purpose?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Between $30,000 and $40,000 is the unexpended balance.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The report of the committee says about $25,000.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I do not know exactly, as they are constantly at work there, but the last report was that there was between $30,000 and $40,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much is it estimated will be required to deepen the entrance to 24 feet?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I could not state.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was a survey, was there not?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. There is another survey reporting in favor of deepening the entrance of the harbor to 30 feet, but we are asking now that this be used to make the entrance 24 feet, so that the whole harbor can be made available to that depth.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there no estimate of what the cost will be?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. For the 24 feet; no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Does the gentleman know whether it will take the balance or more than the balance?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I do not know; but I believe this balance will complete it.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman answer this question? Is it likely to commit us to something that will take a very much larger sum than the unexpended balance?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Not at all; not a single dollar.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman answer this question? When this resolution was reported it was not yet settled whether there would be a river and harbor bill brought into this House this year. As I understand it from common rumor, it is now settled that there will be brought into the House a river and harbor bill, and I assume that means it will become a law. Is there any reason why this should not go on the river and harbor bill in connection with other projects for other places?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. There is not, except that the necessity for deepening this entrance is pressing at the present time.

Mr. MANN. Is not that true of all proposed river and harbor improvements that the necessity is pressing, at least pressing very hard upon the Members who are advocating the project?

Mr. PAYNE. As I understand it, this money is already appropriated for the purpose of making this turning basin in the harbor. There is an unexpended balance of some $30,000 or $40,000. It develops now the water on the bar is only 20 feet, while the turning basin will permit of a depth of 24 feet, and this is simply for the purpose of deepening that with the $30,000 or $40,000 of unexpended balance, to dig out this bar so that vessels drawing 24 feet of water can come in there. This is to make available what improvements have already been done there. It does not require any new appropriation, but is simply a diversion of the money for the same project, and that is, it seems to me, a good reason for taking it up now.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire if the gentleman is on the Rivers and Harbors Committee?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much are you going to ask for the improvement of rivers and harbors?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. That I am not able to say; the bill is not completed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much money is left of this unexpended balance?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. It is impossible to say exactly, because since this resolution was introduced, some time ago, they have been going on with the work on this turning basin and spending the balance for that purpose. In my judgment, there is in the neighborhood of $30,000 or $40,000.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much will it take to remove that core you are talking about?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. To deepen the bar?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Not to deepen the bar, but to remove the core.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. The money appropriated for that purpose will complete it.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Provided you do not divert it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If that is true, why do you want this special resolution?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. We want the money now on hand to be expended in deepening the entrance to the harbor, because the turning basin, in the condition it now is, will allow the turning of vessels, consequently the only pressing necessity of the harbor is to deepen the entrance from 20 to 24 feet, making it the same depth as all the rest of the harbor.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If you use up all the money appropriated for that harbor for this performance that you are speaking about, will not that necessitate another appropriation by Congress to remove that core——

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Certainly.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri (continuing). That this money was appropriated for originally?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Certainly. It is simply to relieve the pressing necessity of that harbor. Ships have come there recently drawing more than 20 feet, and could not enter the harbor because the entrance was only 20 feet, whereas the balance of the harbor was 24 feet.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why was not this thing put on the river and harbor bill?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Because our desire was to make this fund available at once for this purpose.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not this a fact: If we permit you to get what you want, and permit Tom, Dick, and Harry to get what they want, by special resolutions brought in here, that the rest of us who want a general scheme of river and harbor improvement will be left in the cold in the end?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Not at all.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman why did he not have this put in the urgent deficiency bill, which has just now passed the Senate?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Because we selected this method as the best. It is new legislation and would require a special act in order to make this transfer. The money is already appropriated, and this act would legalize the transfer.

Mr. LIVINGSTON. But why did not you ask the committee to have it put on the bill transferring the money that was appropriated?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. We maintain this is the proper way.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman requested an appropriation in the coming river and harbor bill to deepen this entrance to the channel to 30 feet on the survey already made?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I will say to the gentleman that I am in hopes that we can appropriate for the entire scheme to deepen the whole of that harbor, including the entrance, to 30 feet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, if that be true this bill should not pass.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. The only point, if the gentleman from New York will allow me, and the only object of this resolution, was to make this small unexpended balance available to meet the urgent necessities of that harbor at once.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is nothing in the report to show that it is urgent; no report from the Chief of Engineers, and no statement of the local engineer as to the urgency. And if, as the gentleman says, a survey has been made for improving this entrance by deepening it to 30 feet, and an estimate of the cost of that improvement has been made, and that no estimate has been made of how much it will cost to deepen it to 24 feet, I believe the interests of the harbor will be advanced by having this improvement taken care of in the river and harbor bill, authorizing the 30 feet instead of 24 feet.

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. If the gentleman will allow me to suggest, whatever is done under this resolution to deepen the entrance to the harbor from 20 to 24 feet will be that much accomplished, and will not be necessary to be done under the general project to deepen it to 30 feet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How much will it take to deepen it to 30 feet?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. The project takes in the entire work in the harbor and does not segregate the entrance from the balance of the harbor.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I think the House is entitled to know how much a projected improvement will cost, and should not be asked to permit money that has not been expended for one project to be given to another that has not yet been authorized. Until I can have an opportunity to find the real facts of the situation about this project if it is to be pressed for passage at the present, I shall object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McLACHLAN of California. I ask, if the gentleman insists upon his objection, that the bill be passed without prejudice.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that can not be done under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will examine the rule.

Mr. MANN. It can be passed without prejudice by unanimous consent.

Mr. GAINES. Well, if that sort of practice is a proper interpretation of the rule, Mr. Speaker, we will have these matters on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent piled up to a point where it will be absolutely intolerable. In my opinion, when matters are on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, they ought to go through or go off the calendar when they are reached.

The SPEAKER. The rule provides in the last clause:

Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall immediately be stricken from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and it shall not thereafter be placed thereon.

The rule seems mandatory.

Mr. MANN. But, Mr. Speaker, it is very important to have this matter passed on so that the House may be properly advised. Objection has not been made yet to the bill.

The SPEAKER. But the request was made for the purpose of passing it without prejudice, which would allow it to remain on the calendar.

Mr. MANN. Of course that can only be done by unanimous consent, but where an objection has not been made to the bill the rule does not require it to be stricken from the calendar. Now, it may often happen when a matter comes before the House that some one desires additional information in reference to the bill before it shall be considered by unanimous consent, and it seems to me that a proper construction of the rule would permit of the person in charge of the bill asking that the bill be passed without prejudice, no objection to its consideration having in fact been made, because that would still leave the bill where it could be acted upon by the House after the information is obtained.

The Speaker will notice that to say that when the bill is brought before the House it must act upon it, is not either the spirit or the letter of the rule. The rule says it can not go on the Unanimous Consent Calendar more than once. The rule is to a large extent following Rule VIII in the Senate, where it is common practice in the construction of the rule to permit bills to be passed over without prejudice and by unanimous consent where no objection is made to them. I should think that was the fairest construction of this rule; it still leaves it within the power of the House, by unanimous consent, to consider the bills on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will read the rule in full. The request was made by the gentleman from California that the bill be passed over without prejudice, so as to allow it to remain on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The whole rule is as follows:

Paragraph 3, Rule XIII:

"3. After a bill which has been favorably reported shall have been upon either the House or the Union Calendar for three days, any Member may file with the Clerk a notice that he desires such bill placed upon a special calendar, to be known as the 'Calendar for Unanimous Consent.' On days when it shall be in order to move to suspend the rules, the Speaker shall, immediately after the approval of the Journal, direct the Clerk to call the bills upon the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall immediately be stricken from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent and it shall not thereafter be placed thereon."

Now, the Chair, in construing this rule, has held that a bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar shall be upon the printed calendar. Why? So that every Member of the House, by consulting the calendar, may be informed what bills are subject to unanimous consent upon that calendar. The rule, it seems to the Chair, is mandatory that if objection is made, not that the bill shall be defeated, but that it shall take its departure from the Unanimous Consent Calendar and return by leave of the House to the Union Calendar. But, as a matter of fact, objection is made——

Mr. MANN. Objection has not been made in this case.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; but there comes the request that it be passed without prejudice, which is equivalent to another chance for the bill upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the Member in charge of the bill were ill, unable to be on the floor, and the House desired to extend the courtesy to that Member, as might readily be the case, to pass the bill without prejudice until the Member should be present. Does the Speaker rule that it is not possible for the House to so do?

The SPEAKER. There are 391 Members of the House. If there be some Member that is especially interested in a bill upon this calendar, some other Member or colleague might act for him. Furthermore, these bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar do not disappear from the House or the Union Calendar when they are put on this calendar. They are on two calendars, retaining their place on the House or the Union Calendar. The rule seems to be mandatory.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, Just a word. It seems to me that the error that the Chair is about to fall into is in not distinguishing between the consideration of the bill on its merits and such consideration on a motion to pass a bill without prejudice, such as the one that is made here. The rule does say that if consideration be objected to by any person, thereupon the bill shall go off the calendar, but the motion here does not ask consideration within the meaning of the rule. The consideration there meant is the consideration on the merits. What is asked for here is that the bill may be passed without prejudice, and then it is in the same situation it would have been if not reached to-day on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. This bill is not before the House; the request is to get it before the House.

Mr. SHERLEY. The bill is called by the Clerk. Now, anyone can object to consideration if consideration on its merits is raised. But if in lieu of that a motion is made to pass it without prejudice, then I submit that the rule does not require that it go off the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Unanimous Consent Calendar appears for the first time at this session of Congress. It occurs to the Chair that bills on the House Calendar and on the Union Calendar, not losing their places, are on all fours with bills that are not upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar. The Chair made a ruling, which the House approved, that the bill must be printed upon the calendar, so that a bare glance at the calendar would inform the Members what bills were upon the calendar.

Again, a Member or Members may be present now who would object to the consideration of a bill on the calendar if objection was called for. Objection has not yet been called for. By unanimous consent—otherwise it would be impossible for the House to administer the calendar—there has been talk about this bill. But now, before it is before the House, comes the request that it may be passed. The Chair is of opinion that a fair construction of the rule is that if the bill meets with an objection, that would take it off the calendar, standing as it does upon either the Public or the Union Calendar——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I wish to submit, if the Chair will permit me, that a ruling made by the Chair itself early in the session may have some importance on this subject. Before the establishment of this calendar, when a bill was submitted for unanimous consent and objection was made, if afterwards the Member making the request was able to satisfy the objector that his objections were not well founded, the Chair would resubmit the request. The Speaker has announced, however, that he would not recognize anyone for unanimous consent for a bill which could be placed upon this calendar. Very frequently bills may be placed upon this calendar to which, after some discussion, there may be temporary objection which could be removed if an opportunity were given to furnish the additional information.

It seems to me that many cases might arise where bills would be passed temporarily without injustice, because if anybody be present who wishes to object to the bill he can protect his rights by objecting to the bill being passed and objecting to its consideration. It seems to me that in working out the business of the House in harmony with the practice that has existed heretofore it might be desirable many times to permit bills to be passed temporarily until the information that might be obtainable could be submitted to the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will recollect that there is a calendar Wednesday, when upon the call of committees any committee can call a bill on either the House or Union calendars, and the Chair has noticed, both from the operation of the calendar Wednesday and the state of the House and the Union calendars, that the calendars are being kept comparatively clean.

Now, it occurs to the Chair that if this rule be construed as the gentleman from New York and the gentleman from Illinois suggest, it will take much of the time of the House; that it will subject the Member who objects to an avalanche of pressure, and in the very nature of things it would bring about a practice where the Members—391 in number—would beget the custom of having kissing go by favor.

Mr. MANN. Will the Speaker permit one word more upon that point?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. It is wholly within the power of any Member of the House now to object to the consideration of this bill; and if he so objects, under the rule the bill goes off the Unanimous Consent Calendar. That is what the rule says, and there can be no question about it. It is within the power of any Member of the House now, if he be present in the House, to stop the consideration of this bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar; but the indications are that the ruling of the Speaker will go a great deal further than that. It not only gives any Member of the House now the power to object, but forbids the House unanimously to postpone the consideration of this bill until it can acquire information in reference to it. Now, that is not the wording of the rule. That is not, it seems to me, the spirit of the rule. If when the bill is called before the House no Member does object, why can not the House, by unanimous consent—that is what it will amount to, because any Member can at any time object and stop it—why can not the House, by unanimous consent, postpone the consideration of this measure, allowing it to retain its place on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, so that it will again come before the House with the desired information?

I have repeatedly heard the present occupant in the Speaker's chair say that the House can do anything by unanimous consent. Now, if that be true, then the House certainly can pass a bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, where no one objects, and leave it there, taking it off if anyone objects, and leaving it on if no one objects. Let us look at the effect of the ruling such as has been proposed. It is true that the House and Union calendars are now taken care of very well by calendar Wednesday. It is also true that a little later in this session, and more especially in the next session of Congress, when bills are being reported in with great frequency and when calendar Wednesday will have to be suspended at the next session of Congress on some days in order to pass the appropriation bills, that we may be shortly in a position that no bill, however important, can possibly be reached for consideration if some Member has accidentally or erroneously objected at some time to its consideration, or if some Member has erroneously placed it on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. He can not take it off. If it comes before the House under that ruling, it must be disposed of. He can not postpone it; if some one objects, it is lost—a bill that every Member may desire to pass. It seems to me that will get the House into a pretty bad tangle.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state that the Unanimous Consent Calendar was provided by a rule adopted by the present Congress. Calendar Wednesday, one day in each week, went into the rules to deal exactly with the same class of bills, so that there is one day in each week that must be devoted to the House Calendar and the Union Calendar unless two-thirds of the Members of the House dispense with calendar Wednesday. In addition to that, under the rule, after a bill has been upon the House or Union Calendar for three days it may, upon the request of a Member, be transferred to the Calendar for Unanimous Consent without at the same time being taken off the House or the Union Calendar, where it has its chance for consideration upon calendar Wednesday, which practically can not be dispensed with. Now, if an objection is made, the bill keeps its status on the House or Union Calendar and can be treated upon calendar Wednesday.

The Chair desires to state that calendar Wednesday already is receiving something of criticism and protest, not against the disposition of bills upon the House and Union calendars, but because of the time that it takes. For instance, under a rule of the House there are two Mondays in the month devoted to business on the District of Columbia, and two for unanimous consents and suspensions, which have the right of way immediately after the Journal has been approved, a request for unanimous consent to consider first, and a motion to suspend the rules second. In addition to that, there is a day set apart each week for private bills granting pensions, paying claims, and so forth. Thus practically three days in each week—Mondays, Wednesdays, and Fridays—are segregated for classes of business. Now, the Chair, looking to the transaction of the public business, and the reason for the calendar Wednesday and the Unanimous Consent Calendar, is of opinion that the construction of the rule or the reading into the rule of something that is not there would tend to embarrass the House in the transaction of business—the great public business.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] says the House can do anything by unanimous consent. That is correct; but the unanimous consent must be under the rules of the House; otherwise it would be in the power of one Member or ten Members, a minority or a majority of the Members and the Speaker, to do all business by unanimous consent, whether from the committee or formed in concrete or vague form in the brain of any Member, without having received consideration by a committee of the House.

Now, having explained the views of the Chair as touching this matter, the Chair is quite willing to take the judgment of the House, because the Chair thinks, from the statement of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] and the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the statement of the Chair, that the House understands the question, and the Chair will submit it to the House.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, before the Chair does that I wish to call attention to one thing. Under the rules the House can not do anything it pleases by unanimous consent. There are certain things that the Speaker can not submit to the House for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER. Under the rules.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Under the rules; but there is nothing in this rule which prohibits the bill being passed by unanimous consent. One of the common expressions of the Chair has been that "the House could pass an elephant through the House by unanimous consent." Of course it was an exaggerated statement, but there is nothing in this rule which would prohibit the House, by unanimous consent, from restoring a bill to this calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to interrupt the gentleman just at that point. After great agitation in the country, in the public press, both newspapers and magazines, about granting unanimous consent being within the power of the Speaker and about how Members would have to crawl upon their knees and in the dust abase their personal and legislative dignity by asking the Speaker to submit matters for unanimous consent, the House, in its wisdom, made calendar Wednesday and made the Unanimous Consent Calendar to get away from asking the Speaker not to run over the dignity of the Member or impose upon the House by exercising his discretion as to whether he would submit a matter for unanimous consent.

Now, then, at the beginning of the operation of this rule, when this bill is called, before objection is made, the gentleman appeals for recognition to the Speaker to submit by unanimous consent a request that this bill shall have another chance. [Applause.]

The Chair will submit this question: Shall it be in order for the Speaker to entertain a request for unanimous consent that a bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar be passed without prejudice?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the House understands——

Mr. SHERLEY. But I submit, Mr. Speaker, if the Chair thinks of submitting the matter to the House, the matter is debatable, and I desire to be heard upon it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. But, Mr. Speaker, that is not the point. Without meaning to be captious, if the matter is submitted to the House, then I desire to debate the matter before the House. If the Chair is to decide, then I will await the decision of the Chair.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I make another point of order. My point of order is, the question submitted to the House in the form in which it has been submitted does not accurately describe the question before the House. I made the original point of order, and I should like to be heard upon the point of order for a few moments——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will suspend for a moment. The submission put by the Chair was, "Shall it be in order for the Speaker to entertain a request for unanimous consent that a bill on the Unapimous Consent Calendar be passed without prejudice?" It seems to the Chair that is just the case, but the Chair will hear the gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. GAINES. Request was made not to pass the bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar in the first instance; that is not what occurred. The matter was called up, read by the Clerk, preliminary debate was had by unanimous consent pending the consideration of the request; and then, after it appeared that the matter had been thrashed out in the House to such a point that it was apparent objection would be made, the request was to withdraw the request for unanimous consent to consider the bill, and to ask unanimous consent that it be passed without prejudice and retain its place on the calendar. Now, it may be very well that this House and the Speaker might hold in the case of the absence of a Member or in any other case that a request should be made for unanimous consent to pass a bill on the calendar without prejudice, and that that request should be entertained and acceded to, but it is a very different proposition to pursue the matter up to the point of objection, and after a request for unanimous consent to consider it has been made, to then request a withdrawal of the bill in order to avoid an objection obviously impending. I submit that the proposition put by the Speaker to the House is not entirely accurate. The proposition is whether the House will permit a unanimous consent to be withdrawn after it is made and after a discussion has been had on the merits of the bill, pending the conclusion on the part of Members whether they will make an objection. That is the proposition before the House, and a very different one from asking in the first instance that the matter go over until some other day without prejudice. I submit, Mr. Speaker, if we are to debate these bills in the usual form, upon a request for unanimous consent until it is determined that some Member will object, and then permit such bills to be restored to their place on a calendar, then the calendar will be so crowded that bills far down on it will never get any benefit whatever of the calendar for unanimous consent. It will be a race between Members of this House to see who can get as far up as possible on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and the rule will be a fruitful source of intolerable congestion of legislation and defeat the very purpose for which the House passed it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Could not that be stopped by some one simply objecting to unanimous consent to postpone?

Mr. GAINES. People will not object. My answer to that, and it seems conclusive to me, is this: That if gentlemen can make that sort of an appeal, we will never have any final objection and the same old bills will stay at the head of the calendar and clog it up, and the House will have no opportunity of reaching other bills of equal or perhaps greater merit which happen by chance to be lower down on the calendar.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make an additional point of order.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to occupy any time, but to ascertain certainly as to what proposition is being submitted to the House. My purpose was to raise the same question as that which has been raised by the distinguished gentleman from West Virginia. I understood the question decided, or before the Speaker, was whether after a bill had been called up for consideration from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, and after objection is made to its consideration, that the rule must be enforced and it must go off such calendar. Now, then, is it not asking, in submitting it to the House now, whether by unanimous consent we are setting aside that rule and doing it permanently, so that in future whenever we can get a bill up, and it is objected to, we can get the privilege of keeping it on the calendar? I do not think that any other question than that is now before the House, and any other question submitted would be a mere abstraction. If the Chair is going to submit the question whether or not by unanimous consent a bill that has been called up for consideration on the Unanimous Consent Calendar can be retained on the calendar before objection to its consideration is made, that will be a proper question; but if we are going to go the whole length and set the rule aside by a mere construction directly in opposition to the plain language of the rule, then we better wait until the real question has arisen and has been discussed. If the rule is wrong, it should be amended by the House, not set aside by arbitrary construction.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order, if the Chair will hear me.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. SIMS. If I understand the submission of the Chair, it virtually means an amendment to the unanimous-consent rule, or the Speaker is submitting a point of order to decision of the House; I would like to know what the Chair's ruling as to it is. If it is an amendment to the unanimous-consent rule, I make the point of order that under the rule nothing can be considered on this day not on the Unanimous Consent Calendar.

The SPEAKER. The Chair listened to the gentleman from West Virginia, also to the gentleman from Ohio, and other gentlemen. The Chair is quite free to say that he has no pride of opinion touching this matter. It occurs to the Chair that the matter proposed to be submitted to the House does not state the question as it exists in fact. Two questions in the construction of that rule arise or might arise. The one that arises now is—

> Shall it be in order, after there has been discussion as to a bill called on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, for the Speaker to entertain a request that the bill be passed without prejudice?

Now, that is one. Now, there may be still another question arise, namely—

> Shall it be in order, before there has been discussion as to a bill called on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, for the Speaker to entertain a request for unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice?

That is not the question now pending before the House, but suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. The Chair will again read what he will submit to the House, modifying the former submission, or withdrawing it entirely—

> Shall it be in order, after there has been discussion as to a bill called on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, for the Speaker to entertain a request for unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice?

Mr. SIMS. Is that virtually an amendment to the rule or construing the rule?

The SPEAKER. It is construing the rule. It is just the same in all matters about which gentlemen disagree; and each Member is quite as much interested in the proper construction of the rule as the Chair. After all, rules like laws, like all judisdictions that control the action of men, have to be construed. We have got very few rules in the Manual; I do not know exactly, but about 40. It is the work of one hundred and twenty years, and yet the precedents that have been made by the House fill eight volumes of about a thousand pages each. So that it is the construction of the rules which make the law for the House; and the Chair has felt justified in submitting, after discussion, this question to the House to determine what shall be the construction of the rule.

Mr. SHERLEY. If I understand the Chair is to submit that question, I would like to be recognized to address the House on it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would like to know in advance if the Speaker is going to submit the point of order to the House, because I want to address myself to the House, if it is to decide; and if the Chair is to decide, then I shall endeavor to convince the Chair.

The SPEAKER. Precisely; the Chair has submitted to the House. The Chair has just read again what the House is to vote upon.

Mr. SHERLEY. The general proposition is simply this: What construction of this rule will best promote the business of the House and best comply with all the rights of the Members of the House? Now, it has been urged by those who oppose the right to submit a motion for unanimous consent to pass without prejudice when a bill is reached on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, that if we allow such motion we would unnecessarily encumber this calendar, and that the calendar would never be cleared. My response to that proposition is simply this: A matter is called up, as it was this morning; there is discussion had upon it. During that discussion it becomes evident that some gentleman is proposing to object. The matter comes up casually, and for that reason you can not understand the question, and in order that the matter may be more clearly understood by the House, and that a Member may have time to investigate outside, the advocate of the bill moves that it may be passed without prejudice. Now, then, any man who has determined that he does not want the matter further considered can prevent the calendar from being crowded up by simply saying, "I object." Then the question is forced of the consideration of the bill, and by an objection it is put out of the way; it is off the calendar, and off forever.

But if you adopt the construction intimated by the Chair and advocated by the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] you have yourself in this situation: A bill may be brought up on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. It is a bill of some intricacy. During the discussion a confusion arises as to just what it means. A man with that doubt in his mind, unwilling to let it come up by unanimous consent, if forced to act upon it then, will object. Then immediately it goes off that calendar and goes onto the calendar from which it came, either the House or the Union Calendar. When it gets there, it has been stated by the Speaker that upon calendar Wednesday it could be reached; but that may or may not be true. The call of the calendar may be with a committee so far away from that bill that it will not be reached that way, and yet it is a matter that when properly understood, by a little investigation on the outside, would have gone through by unanimous consent.

Now, we adopted this rule, not to put ourselves in a worse position than we were when the Speaker recognized Members for unanimous consent, but to put ourselves in a better position; and yet every man on this floor who has had any experience knows that he has had occasion to have the Speaker recognize him for unanimous consent, the matter would be called up, and objection would be made. Subsequently, he would see the man who had objected, and explain to him the situation fully, and that man's reason for objection would be removed. He would then obtain from the Speaker recognition again and would again ask unanimous consent, and the bill would go through.

Now, if the rule is to be construed as the gentleman from West Virginia contends, we are infinitely worse off than we were before, because when a bill is called on the Unanimous Consent Calendar and objection is made, by virtue of some doubt and the need of some explanation, that bill is forever denied the right to come up on that calendar during the entire Congress, and I submit that that is not a position that the House ought to put itself in, and I hope the House will affirmatively determine that it is right for the Chair to submit a request to have a bill on the Unanimous Consent Calendar passed without prejudice. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say but a word in answer to the very lucid statement of the gentleman from Kentucky, and that is this: If we adopt the practice of permitting Members of the House to bring up for unanimous consent their bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, debate them, in answer to the various questions of Members of the House, and then when they reach the point of requesting unanimous consent they find that it is likely to be refused—if we allow the bills under these circumstances to remain on the calendar, we will have this condition existing: Nobody likes to object to anybody's bill. We all hate to do it. Nothing but a strong sense of duty ever induces one to make an objection when a brother Member wishes a bill passed. Now the easy way to make objections will be pointed out. Members will say, "If this bill is to be considered now I shall have to object." Then the request will be that the bill go over and remain on the Unanimous Consent Calendar. My answer to the proposition that this calendar will not relieve the old situation, if the view that I contend for is adopted, is this: We have done away now with the old situation. Whether the present rule is an improvement or a mistake I have no disposition to consider; but if we are to permit a few bills at the head of the calendar to be debated, and then to take their place upon the calendar again—for the Member would always ask unanimous consent that they be retained on the Unanimous Consent Calendar—then the top of that calendar will be blocked up, and instead of the old situation of which complaint was made, we will have a new situation from which there will be no escape whatever.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think it is practically possible for the Unanimous Consent Calendar ever to become so long that it will not be gone through with in one day?

Mr. GAINES. I should think that what is occurring here to-day would be a conclusive answer to the question.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman rest his case on whether we get through with this Unanimous Consent Calendar to-day or not? We will be through in an hour after the gentleman finishes his speech.

Mr. GAINES. Well, if we are, there will be less debate than usually takes place in the consideration of such matters. I do not know how many bills there are now on the calendar; I have not counted them.

Mr. MANN. There are as many as usual.

Mr. GAINES. There are 21 bills, and unless we do get some off the calendar, my answer is that the calendar will soon become so long that the foot of it can not be reached, because it will be blocked at the top.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to say to the gentleman from West Virginia that he has been here a good while, and so have I, and time and time again he has seen some gentleman get the permission of the Speaker to call up a bill by unanimous consent, and because of insufficient information some Member objects. Then the man in charge of the bill comes over and has a confabulation with the man that did the objecting, and explains to him the facts in the case, and the man that asked for unanimous consent originally went to the Speaker and told him that the man who objected had withdrawn his objection, whereupon he would get a second chance to call up his bill by unanimous consent, and it would go through. That has been done hundreds of times to my knowledge.

Now, does not this turn out to be the case—if the gentleman's contention is correct, then instead of this rule helping to expedite the business of the House it makes our present condition worse than our former condition? Is not that true?

Mr. GAINES. I will answer the gentleman from Missouri that the former condition never seemed to me to be a particularly bad one.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. But it was one that the people objected to.

Mr. GAINES. I never found the Speaker of the House unwilling or discourteous in a matter of an application for unanimous consent.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I am not saying anything about that.

Mr. GAINES. I do not think the gentleman did. I never found there was any more difficulty in asking the consent of the Speaker, as a Member of this House, than in asking consent of any other Member of the House. Now, the gentleman from Missouri asked me whether our later condition will not be worse than the first. The first was rather more objectionable to the people than to the House, but we have made this modification. I am not able to make a comparison and I have no desire to make a comparison between the new rule, for which I voted, and the old system which it superseded. But I want to say again to the Members of this House that if one who wishes to make an objection can avoid his full responsibility and say, "I shall have to object now;" and if then the gentleman asking unanimous consent may have the bill kept on the calendar, then I know that the new rule will be worse than the old condition, for we will have the calendar congested at the top, which will absolutely preclude the bottom of the calendar from any consideration.

And I want to make this further statement: This is not a case where one has asked, before the request for unanimous consent, that his bill may go over, or where a friend is sick, that the bill may go over, or because of the absence of a Member particularly acquainted with it or interested in it; but here is a case where the matter has taken up the time of the House, and a considerable amount of it, and then, being confronted with an objection, the Member asks that the same matter continue to stand on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, preventing the other 21 bills from consideration.

Mr. SHERLEY. Can not any Member simply object to the request for unanimous consent that it go over?

Mr. GAINES. Yes; but he will not do it. The gentleman from Kentucky knows as well as any Member of this House, for he is both conscientious and courteous, that it is frequently the duty to object and always an unpleasant duty to object. I submit that the conduct of the business of this House has not advanced, but is absolutely impeded, when we make an opportunity for this kind of halfway objection, which postpones the time when one may finally refuse to give his consent to another Member of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I want to make a suggestion. As to this particular case, I did not object. As the gentleman from West Virginia says, it is always a painful performance to object to unanimous consent; but I would object for two reasons until I am informed upon two points about the particular matter pending. In the first place, I would object to it unless I am assured that this is what the doctors call a "sporadic case" coming from the River and Harbor Committee, and was not to be a piecemeal performance, by which the members of that committee can get what they want and the rest of us can not get what we want. That is number one. In the second place, I tried to find out and could not, because the gentleman from California did not seem to know himself, whether, if the money in this particular case was diverted, it would be followed by an appeal for a new appropriation for that project out there.

If those two facts were cleared up in my mind I would not have any disposition whatever to object to this request; but what I say is that, if it goes over by consent, in order that the gentleman from California [Mr. MCLACHLAN] might be able to inform us on both of those points, and if the doubt in the case were resolved in the way I would like to see it resolved, then, as far as I am concerned, there would not be any objection to it; but if it were resolved the other way, then, when it came up the next time, I would object to it. It seems to me, in the interest of expediting business, when a man comes in here with a matter about which you can not get the information you desire, he ought to be permitted to take it out and get it back here at some other time when we can get the information.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I have not the floor.

Mr. GAINES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MURDOCK. Suppose the gentleman's argument is right about that. Then ought not the bill of the gentleman from California, which has had its opportunity before the House, to go to the bottom of the calendar?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I think that is correct.

Mr. MURDOCK. But there is no such proposition before the House. It takes its place at the head of the calendar.

Mr. GAINES. But the difficulty is that we are proceeding under the rule, and the rule does not provide any way to get it at the bottom of the calendar. Possibly the suggestion now made that by unanimous consent it may go to the bottom of the calendar introduces a third proposition. We are getting pretty far away from the original proposition.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I submit to the gentleman that while there might be some few cases where a man would make what he calls a halfway objection, and force the matter to go over, yet the other side of the question would present such a hardship on the House that of the two evils the former would be the lesser. If the gentleman's construction is concurred in, then a bill having once been on that calendar and being objected to can never by any possibility get back during the two years' life of the Congress, and while it may be that occasionally a bill will remain on the calendar that ought to have gone off, the very next day that calendar is called it will go off in a hurry, as it should go off the first time if a man did his full duty. The whole argument of the gentleman is based on the premise that we are going to be cowardly in doing what we ought to do.

Mr. GAINES. O Mr. Speaker, not at all. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] may use better terms, and I may modify them. I say the difficulty is that we are rather courteous to each other in doing our duty in the House. Here is this bill which has had its hearing to-day. It has had its day in court. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] shows that he contemplates another consideration of it when it comes up at some other time if it remains on the calendar. I submit that we are up to this proposition, whether we will so administer this rule as to advance the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, so that everybody may have his chance, or whether the Calendar for Unanimous Consent is to be monopolized by bills that happen to be at the top.

Mr. LONGWORTH. As I understand the gentleman, he makes distinction between the case of a bill on which some discussion has been had and a bill on which no discussion has been had?

Mr. GAINES. Oh, yes; a very clear distinction.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, the proposition as submitted by the Chair, if I understand it, is that after a bill has been discussed and arguments made in favor of it, the statement and arguments not being sufficient to remove objection or satisfy every Member of the House so that he will not object after all that information is ascertained, a request then comes to pass it over without prejudice to some future day, at which time a similar request may be made. Now, the other proposition, as I understand it, is to submit at the time the bill is reached on the calendar a request to pass it over without prejudice before any statement is made or discussion is had on the bill by the proponent of the bill as to its merits, so as to cover the case of accident, like the illness or unavoidable absence of a Member.

I would be willing to vote for such a construction of the rule, but as submitted it means that after an opportunity to get up and explain a bill, when some gentleman like the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] gives notice that if the bill is not passed over he will object, the gentleman in charge, under compulsion, asks to pass the bill without prejudice. In the meantime he has a private conference with the objecting Member, and perhaps satisfies him, so that he will not object on the next day when unanimous consents are in order. So by such a course, when the day rolls around for the Unanimous Consent Calendar to be taken up, some other gentleman, who perhaps not being present on the occasion when the bill was first reached, says he will object unless the bill is again passed over. Thus, after taking considerable time on both occasions in explaining the bill, it goes over again. It is possible to repeat this performance on many bills, and virtually waste all the time on the only day when unanimous consents are in order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will permit, the gentleman should state in fairness that I called for certain information which the gentleman was unable to give, and it was for the purpose of enabling him to get the information.

Mr. SIMS. Of course, I accept the statement of the gentleman from New York, but the bill was presented by the gentleman in charge of it, and he endeavored to satisfy the gentleman from New York and, therefore, he being unable to make out a case for unanimous consent, virtually asked for a continuance in court after the case was tried and before the verdict. Then, exactly as the gentleman from West Virginia claims, on the next unanimous-consent day he may call up his bill again. In the meantime the gentleman from New York has been satisfied. How? Not by any statement or argument before any committee, not by statements or argument before this House, but privately. I submit that such a practice as that is not a model way of removing objections to legislation. Now, then—— [Cries of "Vote!"]

I know you are getting tired, but this is a good way to waste time. Now, such a proceeding as this will be just as the gentleman from West Virginia has stated. It will give any Member an opportunity to try to have his bill passed here every unanimous-consent day as long as the session may last or as long as Congress may last.

Now, is that fair, and is that justice to the House? Is that a method of legislation which ought to be encouraged? I am not speaking particularly of this bill, but it seems to me to illustrate the evil of such a course. Here is a gentleman on the Rivers and Harbors Committee asking unanimous consent to pass a bill, and nearly every one of us expect a little piece of pork in the river and harbor bill, and we are naturally embarrassed when it comes to objecting to a bill pressed by a member of that committee. It puts such a member in the shape of dominating to some extent the Members of the House even further than if consent had to come from the Speaker. I think this proposition ought to be voted down. I agree that a bill may be passed over, provided it is the first request and does not come after discussion has developed that unanimous consent can not be had. I hope that this proposition will be voted down in its present form and not permit a bill to be passed over after it has been thoroughly discussed and its lack of merit sufficiently developed to warrant some Member of the House in objecting to its consideration without further explanation.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would not detain the House if this were not such an important matter. The gentleman from West Virginia, the Speaker in the suggestion he has made, and the gentleman from Tennessee, assume that you must construe this rule one way before the discussion, perhaps, and another way after the discussion, perhaps, and I suppose it is within the power of the House to make an illogical construction of the rule; but the proposition is not to amend the rule, but to construe the rule, and if the rule allows a request for unanimous consent to be put before the bill is discussed at all, then the rule allows the request for unanimous consent to be put at any time before objection is made, because under the rule there is no difference until objection is made. Now, regardless of that, the argument made by the gentleman from West Virginia and the gentleman from Tennessee is that if a bill shall be passed without prejudice on this calendar it will permit the calendar to be so loaded up that bills will not be reached. I have watched unanimous consents in this House more or less ever since I have been in the House and I have never yet seen a day occupied in this House on unanimous consent, and if I stay in this House long enough to see a whole day occupied in the House on unanimous consents I will live to be older than Methuselah.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman must remember that this is not only unanimous-consent day, but this is suspension day also, and unanimous consents are not all we have to deal with on unanimous-consent days.

Mr. PAYNE. Did the gentleman from Illinois ever see a day prior to this Congress when any man in the House could not stop unanimous consent by calling for the regular order? Of course the gentleman never saw a whole day occupied by unanimous consent.

Mr. MANN. I have seen the House consider a good many requests for unanimous consent, and during the time when Mr. Reed was Speaker, when unanimous consents were only considered once a month or more, I have seen the time of the House occupied for a good while—less than half a day—in going through requests for unanimous consent which were made, but any Member now can stop all bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar in a very few moments by simply saying when the bill is presented, "I object."

Mr. PAYNE. I want to say to the gentleman, he did not see so many bills considered, although he may have seen a good many bills passed; and they were not considered by the House because Members did not like to object.

Mr. MANN. That is the situation, and always will be. The Speaker himself says that the reason for the introduction of this rule was because of the objection of many Members to going to the Speaker and making the request. That was not the whole reason that some gentlemen favored the rule, and the reason the country asked for something, by people who are not well informed. I take it that the real reason of this rule is that the Members may be informed when unanimous consent is to be asked of the House on bills, so that any Member who was interested in the investigation of any bill might know from the calendar when he would need to be in his seat to object. That was the real reason for the rule.

Now, Mr. Speaker, if the construction contended for by the gentleman from West Virginia shall prevail, there will be many bills pending in this House when the session ends, without any opportunity to bring them before the House, much to the regret of gentlemen that may be interested in them, because some one will have temporarily objected to the consideration, and there will be no opportunity afterwards to bring the bill before the House except on calendar Wednesday, and at the end of the session calendar Wednesday will be inevitably loaded with work it is unable to perform.

Mr. SHERLEY. Will the gentleman yield to a suggestion, to answer the statement made by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] that the bill ought to go to the foot of the calendar? That can be had in this way: If the request is made for unanimous consent that it be passed without prejudice any Member can simply state, "If the gentleman will modify his request so that the bill shall go to the foot of the calendar, I will not object." But if you adopt the contention of the gentleman from West Virginia, no latitude is allowed at all; you are simply tying your hands for a whole Congress.

Mr. MANN. The suggestion made by the gentleman from Kansas met with no serious objection, I take it. The House will never see any loading up of the calendar with unanimous consents. There is no possibility of getting the calendar overloaded with unanimous consents when twice a month there will be consideration of the bills. It makes no difference whether the bills are at the top of the calendar or at the bottom of the calendar. If it is on the Unanimous Consent Calendar at all it will be reached for consideration, but this contention would take it off the calendar and put it where it can not be reached for consideration. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. LONGWORTH. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. In the event that the House shall determine this question in the negative, is it the intention of the Chair to submit the question as to whether the Chair shall recognize gentlemen for a discussion on the question of postponing?

The SPEAKER. When that question is presented the Chair will decide it. This is the question pending before the House, the submission to the House, in further answer to the parliamentary question. The Chair reads it again:

Shall it be in order, after there has been discussion as to a bill called on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, for the Speaker to entertain a request for unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice?

When that question is decided, answering the question further, if it should be decided in the negative it would probably be in order to discuss the question of asking whether it be passed without prejudice before debate. However, that matter can be determined when it arises.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, the original question turned upon the construction to be given this sentence in the rule:

Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall immediately be stricken from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent and it shall not thereafter be placed thereon.

It is clear to me that the word "consideration," as here used, means present consideration—not future consideration, but present consideration—and therefore that this sentence properly construed would read as follows:

Should objection be made to the present consideration of any bill, and so forth, it shall immediately be stricken from the calendar, and so forth.

Now, in reason, any motion or request the granting of which would prevent present consideration is, under this rule, to be treated as if it were a straight-out objection to present consideration. The motion or request of the gentleman from California to permit this bill to go over without prejudice is, in effect, the exact equivalent of an objection to its present consideration. I take it that the proper construction of these words in the rule is the construction which the Speaker intimated, or seemed to intimate, that he would give them in the first instance.

But I do not think the rule as it now reads is all that it ought to be, and therefore I am very glad that the House has been accorded this opportunity to put a construction upon it.

When the opportunity presents itself, I shall vote so to construe the rule as that before any discussion of a bill a motion may be made that it shall go over until a future day without prejudice. But if a gentleman, upon his request for unanimous consent, has occupied the time of the House for half an hour or three-quarters of an hour or an hour and a half and not been able by the facts at his command to convince the House that it should grant unanimous consent and pass the bill, he ought not again upon the same measure to take up the time of the House on another unanimous-consent day.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. He ought to have present consideration.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. He ought to have present consideration and be prepared with all his facts to show that the bill should pass, or else, before debate, he should ask that the bill go over.

Several MEMBERS. Vote! Vote!

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will again report the proposition which is submitted to the House.

The Clerk read as follows:

Shall it be in order, after there has been discussion as to a bill called on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, for the Speaker to entertain a request for unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice?

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANDLER. Right in connection with that, suppose that this proposition submitted by the Speaker is voted down by the House; then will this bill, and bills similarly situated in the future, go off the calendar entirely, not only for the session in which the request is made, but for the entire Congress, so that it will be impossible to get that bill back upon the Unanimous Consent Calendar during that Congress?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman desires to know whether, under this rule, if a bill goes off the Unanimous Consent Calendar, losing its place there, but having its place, however, on the Public Calendar, it may come back on the Unanimous Consent Calendar?

Mr. CANDLER. During the whole of that Congress.

The SPEAKER. That is hardly a parliamentary question; but the Chair will answer it, if there be no objection, by reading the rule:

Should objection be made to the consideration of any bill so called, it shall be immediately stricken from the calendar and shall not thereafter be placed thereon.

The Chair supposes that means during the Congress. As many as favor——

Mr. GAINES. Let it be reported again.

The Clerk again read the pending question.

The SPEAKER. As many as wish to answer in the affirmative will say aye; as many as desire to answer in the negative will say no.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SHERLEY. Division!

The House divided; and there were—ayes 97, noes 128.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for tellers.

Mr. GAINES. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. MANN. I do not expect to ask for the yeas and nays, as far as I am concerned. I ask for tellers.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let us get the yeas and nays. Let us see who want to do business.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 140, nays 147, answered "present" 7, not voting 93, as follows:

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, did the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] vote?

The SPEAKER. He did.

Mr. CARTER. I voted "present," thinking I was paired with the gentleman from California. I wish to withdraw my vote of "present."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. CARTER, and he voted "aye," as above recorded.

Mr. BURGESS. Mr. Speaker, how am I recorded?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is not recorded.

Mr. BURGESS. I was present and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman giving attention when his name should have been called, and did not hear it?

Mr. BURGESS. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. BURGESS, and he voted "aye," as above recorded.

Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, I was present and giving attention and did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will call the gentleman's name.

The Clerk called the name of Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT, and he voted "aye," as above recorded.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to state, by permission of the House, it would seem that the vote in the negative in this case would fairly well imply, when taken in connection with the debate, that it would be in order before there has been discussion as to a bill called on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent, for the Speaker to entertain a request for unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice, and the Chair would be so inclined to rule when the question should arise, if it did.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. What disposition would be made of it? Ought it not then to go to the foot of the calendar?

The SPEAKER. That question does not arise at the present time. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution under consideration when the question of order arose?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska objects. The Clerk will call the next business.

TWO CONCURRENT GRAND JURIES IN CERTAIN CASES.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 16037) to amend section 810 of the Revised Statutes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 810 of the Revised Statutes be amended so as to read:

"SEC. 810. No grand jury shall be summoned to attend any circuit or district court unless one of the judges of such circuit court, or the judge of such district, in his own discretion, or upon a notification by the district attorney that such jury will be needed, orders a venire issue therefor. If the United States attorney for the district shall certify in writing to the district judge, or the senior district judge of the district, or one of the judges of said circuit court, that the exigencies of the public service require it, the judge shall also order a venire to issue for a second grand jury. Either of said courts may in term order a grand jury to be summoned at such time, and to serve such time as it may direct, whenever in its judgment it may be proper to do so. But nothing herein shall operate to extend beyond the time permitted by law the imprisonment before indictment found of a person accused of a crime or offense, or the time during which a person so accused may be held under recognizance before indictment found."

With the following amendment: Line 3, page 2, strike out "shall" and insert "may."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask an explanation from the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS].

Mr. JOHNSON of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, there is only one new sentence in this bill. It is the second sentence, which allows the judge on the certificate of the district attorney that the exigency of public business requires it to impanel a second grand jury. In the city of New York business is so congested that one grand jury can not get through with it, and this section was recommended by the district attorney there, recommended by the Attorney-General of the United States in his annual report, and is desired by everyone in the interests of justice, so that the business of the district attorney at that place may be done. The word "may" is to take the place of the word "shall." The district judge may order another grand jury.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PARKER. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. Has not a judge of the district court in New York now the power to call a second grand jury?

Mr. PARKER. After the expiration of the first, but not at the same time.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Then, as I understand it, they want to have two grand juries at a time.

Mr. PARKER. Yes; two grand juries there at once, so as to get through with the business. It is absolutely needed. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS], who introduced the bill, may have a word more to say. I yield to him sufficient time——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, but I wanted to ask the gentleman from New Jersey a question first, inasmuch as I reserved the right to object.

Mr. PARKER. I thought perhaps the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARSONS] might answer the gentleman. What is the question? I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Oh, no; I have no question now.

Mr. PARKER. Oh, the gentleman from Georgia—please—we have——

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I believe I shall object to the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects. The Clerk will report the next business.

ADDITIONAL DISTRICT JUDGE, DISTRICT OF MARYLAND.

The next business was the bill (S. 821) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the district of Maryland.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States shall appoint an additional district judge for the district of Maryland, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, who shall reside in said district and shall possess the same qualifications and have the same power and jurisdiction now prescribed by law in respect to the present district judge therein.

SEC. 2. That no vacancy in the office of the existing district judge of said district of Maryland shall be filled by appointment, and in case of such vacancy there shall be thereafter one district judge only for said district.

SEC. 3. That the present district judge in said district and the one appointed under this act shall agree between themselves upon the division of business and assignment of cases for trial in said district: Provided, however, That in case the said two district judges do not agree, the senior circuit judge of the fourth circuit shall make all necessary orders for the division of business and the assignment of cases for trial in said district.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the report of the committee be read to the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report in the time of the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. 821) to provide for the appointment of an additional district judge in and for the district of Maryland, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it to the House with recommendation that it do pass.

Judge Thomas J. Morris, of Baltimore, is the present district judge. He is 72 years of age, and hence entitled to retire on full pay. He is broken in health and not able to perform all the labors of the position. He, however, does not desire to retire, but will be compelled to do so on account of his health if he does not receive assistance in the way of the appointment of another judge. In case of his retirement the appointment of another judge would of course be necessary. Judge Morris feels that he can do some work and be of assistance in disposing of the congested docket in that district and prefers to remain active for a while.

It is thus to be seen that this bill will incur no additional expense on the Government. If Judge Morris should retire, he would be entitled to full pay, and thus two judicial salaries would be going to that district. If an additional judge is provided for and he continues active for a while, the Government will gain Judge Morris's services during the time that he remains on the bench.

Attorney-General Wickersham recommends the passage of the bill. It also has the indorsement of ex-Attorney-General Bonaparte and many other prominent members of the Maryland bar. The recommendation of the Judiciary Committee that the bill pass is unanimous.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to say anything more than that report says, except that it does not involve one dollar of expense to the Government. Judge Morris can retire any day and still receive full pay. He is only willing to finish up some business that he has and to assist another judge for a time. I hope the gentleman from Illinois will not object. The gentleman said to me privately that we can pass this at some other day, but there is nothing like the present to do a thing.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the call of committees is on Wednesday, and the Committee on the Judiciary is practically the committee on call, or very close to the committee on call, and will be reached on Wednesday. Here is a proposition to create an additional judge.

Mr. TALBOTT. But there will be not a dollar more money come out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. PARKER. Will the gentleman allow a question? Does the gentleman remember that one bill consumed all the time on last Calendar Wednesday, and the Committee on the Library has six bills between this one and its turn on that calendar? Judge Morris is broken in health and desires this relief or else he will be compelled to resign and we will lose his very valuable services.

Mr. MANN. I will say to the gentleman, a few years ago we were asked to pass a bill identically the same as this in the case of Ohio. We passed the bill and the appointee has since died, and now it is proposed because we provided at one time two judges that the Committee on the Judiciary shall recommend an additional judge now. I do not know whether the Committee on the Judiciary will do that or not, but I think this is a bill where we ought to have a chance in the House to put gentlemen on record as to whether they are going to come in when the old judge dies and ask an additional judge. The Committee on the Judiciary will be called next Wednesday, it is very close to the top of the calendar, and I think that is the proper time to dispose of it, and I, therefore, will object. I would not object to the bill being passed over without prejudice, but that is not possible, owing possibly to the attitude of the gentleman himself.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 16364) to amend in part section 658 of the Revised Statutes.

Be it enacted, etc., That so much of section 658 of the Revised Statutes of the United States as provides for the holding of circuit courts in the southern district of New York "exclusively for the trial and disposal of criminal cases, and matters arising and pending in said court, on the second Wednesday in January, March, and May, on the third Wednesday in June, and on the second Wednesday in October and December," be amended so as to read "exclusively for the trial and disposal of criminal cases, and matters arising and pending in said court, on the first Mondays in January, March, May, July, September, and November."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. STERLING. Mr. Speaker, the only purpose of this bill is to change the time of some terms of court held in the southern district of New York. The courts are confined exclusively to the trial of criminal cases. They have now six terms. Four terms are two months apart, then the June term; that is, in the month after the May term, and then there are four months after the June term. The purpose of the bill is to equalize the terms of the court so as to have a term each alternate month during the year. The main purpose of changing the terms is, I think, the grand jury that is held in the summer time has a four months' term and is a great hardship, and the change has been requested by the Attorney-General and by the Department of Justice, and I do not believe there can be any objection to the passage of the bill. It is purely a local matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 111) to donate a brass cannon to the governor of the State of Georgia.

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to deliver, without expense to the United States, to the governor of the State of Georgia, at Atlanta, Ga., if the same can be done without detriment to the public service, a small brass cannon once belonging to the Georgia Military Institute, to be used on a monument to be erected in the confederate cemetery at Marietta, Ga.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

In lines 4 and 5 strike out "the governor of."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object merely for the purpose——

The SPEAKER. This bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. KEIFER. For the purpose of asking a question about this matter.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Speaker, this is a small brass cannon which belonged to the State of Georgia before the civil war and was at the Georgia Military Institute, from where it was captured. The gun is here in the possession of the Government; its history is well known; it is perfectly identified; and the State of Georgia has asked that the gun be returned to them for the purpose of ornamenting a monument. It appealed to the committee, and there was a unanimous report, and, as the report says, it seems to be a simple act of courtesy to the State of Georgia; that the gun is of no value, its historic value alone appertaining to the State of Georgia; and the committee thought that with perfect propriety the gun should be given back to that State, and so the committee made a unanimous report.

Mr. KEIFER. I want to say that my attention was attracted to this joint resolution by its title, which purported to give a brass cannon to the governor of the State of Georgia. I did not know whether or not we had reached the point where we were passing cannon around to even as distinguished a gentleman as the governor of Georgia; but I find the resolution has been changed so as to return it to the State of Georgia. Now, being entirely satisfied with that form of the bill, I have no objection to the cannon going back, but I would like to ask one or two questions. Where was this cannon when it was taken from the Georgia Military Institute?

Mr. SLAYDEN. I will ask my friend from Georgia [Mr. BARTLETT], who is perfectly familiar with its history, to answer that question.

Mr. KEIFER. Where was this cannon at the time it was taken from the Georgia Military Institute?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. At Marietta, Ga., at the Georgia Military Institute.

Mr. KEIFER. Was the cannon there at the time it was taken?

Mr. BARTLETT of Georgia. It was kept there where the boys were taught. I want to state that Mr. LEE, the author of the bill, is absent on account of business, attending a funeral.

Mr. KEIFER. We will take care of his bill, I think. I want to know where this cannon is that is now regarded as of some historic value. In other words, has it been devoted to some historic purpose or is it in some museum somewhere now, and it is proposed to be taken out and returned to the State of Georgia?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It is in the hands of the Ordnance Department, and I will state to my friend that this gun was really obsolete before the war——

Mr. KEIFER. I have no doubt of that.

Mr. SLAYDEN. It was of no value either as a weapon of defense or offense, and now it is proposed to return it to the State of Georgia.

Mr. KEIFER. Does the gentleman know whether or not it was turned over to some military museum?

Mr. SLAYDEN. It was not; it is in the hands of the Ordnance Department.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The gentleman asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of this bill and consider the same in the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "Joint resolution to donate a brass cannon to the State of Georgia."

FOOTBRIDGE ACROSS TUG RIVER, WEST VIRGINIA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18411) to authorize the Thacker Coal Mining Company to construct a footbridge across Tug River at Thacker, Mingo County, W. Va.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Thacker Coal Mining Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of West Virginia, is hereby authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a footbridge and approaches thereto across the Tug River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, at or near Thacker, in the county of Mingo, in the State of West Virginia, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

NEW LAND DISTRICT IN MONTANA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 2523) for the establishment of a new land district in the State of Montana.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That all that portion of the State of Montana included within the boundaries hereinafter described is hereby constituted a new land district, and that the land office for said district shall be located at Havre, in Chouteau County, Mont.: Beginning on the range line when extended between ranges 28 and 29 east, where the same will intersect the international boundary line between the United States of America and the Dominion of Canada; thence south, allowing for the proper offsets on the sixth, seventh, and ninth standard parallels north, to the point of intersection with the center of the Missouri River; thence westerly and northwesterly along the center of the Missouri River to the point of intersection with the center of the Marias River; thence northwesterly along the Marias River to the point of intersection with the Montana principal meridian; thence north along said principal meridian to the point of intersection with the international boundary line; thence east to the range line when extended between ranges 28 and 29 east, to the place of beginning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to reserve the right to object.

Mr. PRAY. Mr. Speaker, I think a brief statement of the matter will be sufficient to show the necessity for the legislation. The facts are stated in the report, and I will ask the Clerk to read the first page of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 2523) for the establishment of a new land district in the State of Montana, having given the bill due consideration, report the same back with the recommendation that it be passed without amendment. The necessity for this legislation will be found from a perusal of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior, which is hereto appended and made a part of this report. This district, when established, will include within its boundaries a great portion of Chouteau County. The office is to be located at Havre. The nearest land office is at Great Falls, 120 miles from the proposed site of the new land office. From recent authentic information received, it appears that on January 13, 1910, there were in the Great Falls land office over 3,000 applications for entry upon public lands which had not been acted upon. New applications are coming in at the rate of 1,000 to 1,500 per month. The nearest land office on the east is about 155 miles and on the west about 250 miles. Owing to the great influx of home seekers in this section of the State, which is the greatest in its history, it appears to be necessary that this office should be established at the earliest possible date for the better accommodation of the settlers.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, the reading of the report satisfies me in reference to the bill, and I withdraw my objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman how much land will be embraced in the control of the new land district?

Mr. PRAY. About 16,000 square miles. It embraces nearly the whole of Chouteau County—about 15,000 square miles, to be more accurate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The bill is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. PRAY. Then I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

TO ABOLISH UNITED STATES LAND OFFICE AT DES MOINES, IOWA.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (S. 5238) to abolish the United States land office at Des Moines, Iowa.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the land office at Des Moines, Iowa, shall be, and is hereby, abolished from and after the 28th day of February, 1910; and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to transfer to the State of Iowa such of the transcripts, documents, and records of the office as are not required for the use of the United States and as the State may desire to preserve.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

CHAPTER 271, VOLUME 35, UNITED STATES STATUTES AT LARGE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 116) to amend an act to correct chapter 271 of volume 35, United States Statutes at Large.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

House joint resolution 116.

Whereas, through an error, chapter 271, volume 35, of the United States Statutes at Large does not express the true intent of Congress in enacting the said chapter 271, as evidenced by examination of the original House bill (H. R. 24835), together with the committee reports thereon, and together with the report of the committee of conference thereon, and the legislative history of the same as evidenced by the Journals of the Senate and House of Representatives, and as set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD for the second session of the Sixtieth Congress: Therefore be it

Resolved, etc., That the words "5 per cent" in the last proviso of the said chapter 271 of volume 35 of the United States Statutes at Large be changed to read "20 per cent," so that the said chapter when so changed shall read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior may, in his discretion, cause to be made, as he may deem wise, under the rectangular system now provided by law, such resurveys or retracements of the surveys of public lands as, after full investigation, he may deem essential to properly mark the boundaries of the public lands remaining undisposed of: Provided, That no such resurvey or retracement shall be so executed as to impair the bona fide rights or claims of any claimant, entryman, or owner of lands affected by such resurvey or retracement: Provided further, That not to exceed 20 per cent of the total annual appropriation for surveys and resurveys of the public lands shall be used for the resurveys and retracements authorized hereby."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. REEDER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to reserve the right to object until I can ask a question or two. I want to ask the gentleman whether this change from 5 to 20 per cent is all the change that is made?

Mr. MONDELL. It is the only change. It is to correct an error in the enrollment of the bill.

Mr. REEDER. Now, this language about not disturbing the lines of men who have settled, regardless of the shape of their claim; is that the usual language in the framing of these laws?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman that it is the language which has been used in the bills which have been passed from time to time providing for resurveys and retracements.

Mr. REEDER. Now, I would like to ask if a settler there has settled on land, and it is very irregular in shape, and they run these lines, supposed to be section lines, and one goes through his land, will he still hold that land on each side?

Mr. MONDELL. In carrying out the retracements in cases of that kind the line is carried to the tract claimed by the entryman, then the tract is surveyed out and he is given his lot.

Mr. REEDER. These lines would go around that, however irregular?

Mr. MONDELL. That is the usual way in which the retracements are made.

Mr. REEDER. I will not make any objection to the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MONDELL. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does this have any effect upon the boundary lines between public lands and the lines of Territories and States?

Mr. MONDELL. I will say to the gentleman this resolution does not change the law except that in the section of the bill which passed the last Congress the percentage of the appropriation that was to be used for the purpose of resurveying was erroneously stated, and it is proposed now to write in the law the action of both the House and Senate.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The reason I asked the question——

Mr. MONDELL (continuing). There is no change made in the existing law, except to correct an error as to the amount of appropriation for surveys and resurveys which may be used in the surveys and resurveys provided for in the bill.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I am glad to hear that that is true. The reason I asked the question was because 56 miles of the line between Texas and New Mexico have not been definitely settled between the United States Government and Texas.

Mr. MONDELL. This resolution could not affect that.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This resolution could not affect that. We have on our part a commission already appointed, and we are awaiting the appointment of commissioners on the part of the United States Government to settle that question, and we do not wish to disturb that situation by this bill.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from further consideration of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and to consider it in the House. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. I suppose the gentleman intends to move to strike out the preamble.

Mr. MONDELL. There is no objection to that.

Mr. MANN. Then, the first two words in line 1 of page 2 ought to be stricken out.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not know that it is necessary to strike out the preamble.

Mr. MANN. It is not customary to let the preamble remain. A preamble is supposed to draw the attention of the House to certain facts. After the joint resolution is passed the preamble becomes of no importance.

Mr. MONDELL. What is the gentleman's suggestion?

Mr. MANN. To strike out the words "the said" in line 1 on page 2. Those words refer to the preamble.

Mr. MONDELL. I think those words refer to the law that we are amending.

Mr. MANN. The words "the said chapter" refer to the preamble. It should read "the last proviso of chapter 271." That covers what the gentleman wants.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the preamble be stricken from the resolution, and that the first two words in line 1 on page 2 to be stricken out.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, strike out in line 1 the words "the said."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONDELL. Also, to strike out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. That will come later.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

By unanimous consent the preamble was stricken out.

BOARD OF REGENTS, SMITHSONIAN INSTITUTION.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 59) providing for the filling of vacancies to occur on January 27, 1910, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Senate joint resolution 59.

Resolved, That the vacancies which will occur on January 27, 1910, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress shall be filled by the reappointment of John B. Henderson and Alexander Graham Bell, residents of the city of Washington, whose terms of office expire on that date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. McCALL. Mr. Speaker, this resolution should be amended, because the 27th of January has already passed.

In line 3 strike out the words "will occur" and insert in place the word "occurred."

In line 8 strike out the word "expire" and insert the word "expired."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 3 strike out the words "will occur" and insert the word "occurred," and in line 8 strike out the word "expire" and insert the word "expired."

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended by striking out the words "to occur" and inserting the words "which occurred."

DEPUTY CLERKS, UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 15665) providing for the appointment of deputy clerks to the United States court of appeals.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That one or more deputies of the clerk of the circuit court of appeals may be appointed by the court on the application of the clerk and may be removed at the pleasure of the court. In case of the death of the clerk his deputy or deputies shall, unless removed, continue in office and perform the duties of the clerk in his name until a clerk is appointed and qualified; and for the defaults or misfeasances in office of any such deputy, whether in the lifetime of the clerk or after his death, the clerk and his estate and the sureties on his official bond shall be liable, and his executor or administrator shall have such remedy for such defaults or misfeasances committed after his death as the clerk would be entitled to if the same had occurred in his lifetime.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I should like to hear an explanation of the bill.

Mr. PARKER. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Judiciary reported unanimously in favor of this bill. The report made by the committee contains all that I could say with reference to this bill, and I ask that the report be read.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. GOEBEL), as follows:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 15665) providing for the appointment of deputy clerks to the United States circuit court of appeals, having had the same under consideration, beg leave to report it back to the House with recommendation that it do pass.

The purpose of the bill is to permit the circuit court of appeals to appoint one or more deputies of the clerk of that court. At present there is no provision of law authorizing such an appointment. In case of the death or serious illness of the clerk no one has power to act for him. No process, mandate, or other official paper can issue from the clerk's office.

Congress has provided for a deputy clerk in every other court of the United States, namely, for the Supreme Court by Revised Statutes, section 678; for the circuit court by Revised Statutes, section 624; for the district court by Revised Statutes, section 558; for the Court of Claims by Revised Statutes, sections 1053–1054; for the supreme court of the District of Columbia by section 174 of the Code of Laws for the District of Columbia; and for the court of appeals for the District of Columbia by section 224 of the same code. The omission in this instance was clearly an oversight.

The bill is drawn substantially like Revised Statutes, section 678. The Attorney-General of the United States in his last report, on page 30, recommends the passage of such measure. As every clerk of the circuit court of appeals now employs one or more assistants, and their compensation being paid by the clerk out of fees received from litigants, it is not likely that the number will be increased nor that the Government will be at any expense.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Speaker, I notice the bill reads "one or more deputies of the clerk of the circuit court of appeals." There are several clerks of the circuit courts of appeals, and it seems to me that the bill ought to provide, if it be proper at all, for a deputy to each clerk of a circuit court of appeals.

Mr. GOEBEL. I have no objection.

Mr. SHERLEY. But I would like the gentleman's opinion on it. I have just seen the bill and that objection occurred to me. It reads "one or more deputies to the clerk of the circuit court of appeals." There are as many clerks as there are circuits.

Mr. GOEBEL. There are nine circuits.

Mr. SHERLEY. Nine clerks. It would seem proper to so draw the bill as to authorize the clerk of each circuit court of appeals to appoint a deputy. The change might be effected by changing the word "clerk," in line 3, to "clerks," so that it would read "one of more deputies to the clerks of the circuit court of appeals."

Mr. PARKER. If you change the word "the" to "each," so that it will read "one or more deputies to each clerk of the circuit court of appeals," it will be sufficient. I ask unanimous consent that that amendment be made.

Mr. SHERLEY. There are more questions I want to ask. This does not change the compensation at all?

Mr. GOEBEL. Not at all.

Mr. SHERLEY. The clerks receive compensation through fees. It does, however, do this. I hope the time is coming very shortly when we will abolish the fee system for the payment of clerks of courts, and when that time comes you are going to find that every man who is getting money by virtue of fees will object to the change, and if you add a lot of deputies you will find hard work to change the fee system.

Mr. GOEBEL. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof."

Mr. SHERLEY. I would like to ask the gentleman what reason there is for the appointment of additional deputies?

Mr. GOEBEL. Not additional deputies.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, deputies.

Mr. GOEBEL. The reason is that if the clerk becomes sick or incapacitated there is no one to act in his place in the issuing of mandates or orders.

Mr. SHERLEY. Is that the only reason?

Mr. GOEBEL. That is the reason given by the Attorney-General.

Mr. SHERLEY. If that is the only reason, it would be better to authorize the court to appoint a clerk to act in the interim; but if he needs additional help right along, there may be a reason for authorizing these deputies.

Mr. MANN. Under the provisions of this bill and the existing law the deputy who acts for the clerk is subject to the bond of the original clerk, whereas if you waited for the court to appoint and for the deputy to give a new bond there would be a time elapse when there would be nobody authorized to sign the papers on behalf of the clerks. We had the same discussion up in reference to deputies of ordinary clerks, holding the bondsmen of the original clerk liable for the action of the deputy after the death of the original clerk. I think that is the reason it is in this form.

Mr. SHERLEY. But here you are authorizing more than one deputy.

Mr. GOEBEL. It depends upon the application of the clerk to the court.

Mr. SHERLEY. I understand it does, but I do not want it to depend on him; I want to get rid of a lot of deputies, who, when it comes to changing the law, will insist on receiving a salary; and if you have six deputies where you could get along with two, you will have difficulty in getting rid of the unnecessary four. I happen to know that there will be legislation shortly in the House looking to a change in the fee system, which ought to have occurred long ago. Now, if the gentleman will make this read "one deputy may be appointed," I will not object.

Mr. GOEBEL. This provides for one or more.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, strike out the "or more."

Mr. GOEBEL. It leaves it within the discretion of the court to appoint one.

Mr. SHERLEY. But I do not want to leave it there.

Mr. GOEBEL. Then I understand the gentleman is not willing to trust the courts as to the number required.

Mr. SHERLEY. One of the very worst things possible is to leave a matter of this kind to somebody's discretion. Wherever we can decide positively and not leave it to discretion, then I am in favor of deciding. I suggest that the gentleman could get the relief by putting it at one deputy.

Mr. GOEBEL. I would suggest to the gentleman that we ought to leave that to the court to determine the necessity of whether there should be one or more.

Mr. SHERLEY. But I do not think so.

Mr. GOEBEL. Then I must differ with the gentleman.

Mr. SHERLEY. Very well, then; if the gentleman wants me to object to the bill in its present form, I shall certainly do it.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is it still in order after the matter has been considered for the gentleman to make an objection?

Mr. SHERLEY. But an objection has been reserved.

The SPEAKER. Objection was reserved, as the Chair recollects, and this discussion has been going on by unanimous consent.

Mr. GOEBEL. Does the gentleman insist upon his position that the bill be so amended or that he will object?

Mr. SHERLEY. I will object unless the amendment I suggest is made to the bill.

Mr. GOEBEL. Then I shall move to amend the bill in that way.

The SPEAKER. First, is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. SHERLEY. With the understanding that the gentleman will offer that amendment, I shall not object.

Mr. GOEBEL. I will offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 3, page 1, strike out the words "or more," and strike out the word "deputies" and insert in lieu thereof the word "deputy."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. SHERLEY. Now, I suggest the other amendment of changing the word "the" to the word "each."

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 3, before the word "circuit," strike out the word "the" and insert in lieu thereof the word "each," so as to read "clerk of each circuit court."

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOEBEL. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment which I desire to have the Clerk report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 6, strike out the words "or deputies."

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CIRCUIT AND DISTRICT COURTS AT SACRAMENTO, CAL.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 4830) establishing regular terms of the United States circuit and districts courts of the northern district of California at Sacramento, Cal.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there shall be one term each of the United States district and circuit courts for the northern district of California held in the city of Sacramento, Cal., in each year from and after the passage of this act, said term to begin on the second Monday in April and continue as long as the business may require.

SEC. 2. That the clerk of the district and circuit courts for the northern district of California and the marshal and district attorney for said district shall perform the duties appertaining to their offices, respectively, for said courts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

PRACTICE IN CERTAIN CIVIL AND CRIMINAL CASES, WESTERN DISTRICT OF ARKANSAS.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 18019) to amend section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice in certain civil and criminal cases in the western district of Arkansas."

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 2 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the practice in certain civil and criminal cases in the western district of Arkansas," approved June 2, 1906, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the defendants in criminal cases now or hereafter pending in the district courts of the Harrison or Texarkana divisions of the western district of Arkansas and who are incarcerated at Fort Smith to await trial because of their inability to furnish bail and who desire to plead 'guilty' may, on their written motion showing those facts and filed in the case, in vacation, and upon the order of the judge, duly signed and filed in the case, have their cases transferred to the Fort Smith division of the western district of Arkansas, to the end that trials may be had and sentences imposed as in other cases of like nature; and prisoners bound over to answer to indictments in the Harrison or Texarkana divisions of the western district of Arkansas for offenses committed in those divisions and who are incarcerated in the jail at Fort Smith, Ark., for inability to furnish bail, and who desire to plead 'guilty' to such offenses, may on their own motions have their cases submitted to a grand jury of the Fort Smith division for indictment and final disposition in the courts of that division, or in proper cases may plead to informations filed in the proper court in said division and have their cases disposed of as other cases of like nature when the offense was committed in the Fort Smith division. When a transfer is ordered, as provided in this section, the clerk shall make out and forthwith send a certified copy of the record entries, together with the indictment and all the original papers, to the clerk of the court to which such case is transferred, who shall file the same, and thereupon the case shall be proceeded with as other cases of like nature pending in such court. For making out said transcript and forwarding the same, together with the original papers in said case, the clerk of the court shall have the usual compensation for making out transcripts and for filing the petition and order and entering the order, and $2 additional, all such compensation to be taxed and paid by the United States as other costs taxed against the United States are paid."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Chair will suggest that this is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and consider the same in the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

BRIDGE ACROSS MONONGAHELA RIVER.

The next business was the bill (H. R. 18895) to authorize the Wilson and Glassport Bridge Company to construct a bridge across the Monongahela River between Wilson and Glassport shoals, Allegheny County, Pa.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Wilson and Glassport Bridge Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Pennsylvania, is hereby authorized to construct a bridge across the Monongahela River from a point suitable to the interests of navigation on State street, in the borough of Wilson, Allegheny County, Pa., about 1,030 feet south of the north boundary line of said borough, to a point on the opposite side of said river in the borough of Glassport, said county and State, at or near the intersection of Broadway and Michigan avenues, in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

With the following amendments:

Page 1, in line 7, strike out the words "on State street."

Page 1, in lines 8, 9, and 10, strike out the words "about 1,030 feet south of the north boundary line of said borough."

Page 1, in lines 11 and 12, strike out the words "at or near the intersection of Broadway and Michigan avenues."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this is an ordinary bridge bill to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Monongahela River, which is an act conforming to the practice of the House, and has the approval also of the Chief of Engineers in the War Department, and I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who introduced the bill, if any further information in regard to it is required, although I will be glad to furnish any additional information.

Mr. TALBOTT. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Maryland does not need any additional information; I withdraw the objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Has the gentleman from Illinois examined this bill?

Mr. MANN. He has, and made a lot of amendments to it.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 18695) to revive an act to authorize the construction of a bridge across Tug Fork of Big Sandy River, West Virginia.

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act authorizing the Borderland Coal Company to construct a bridge across Tug Branch of Big Sandy River," approved June 29, 1906, is hereby revived and reenacted: Provided, That actual construction of the bridge therein authorized shall be commenced within one year and completed within three years from the date hereof.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, there should be an amendment there. I think this bill is improperly printed. It should have a section 2, to read:

The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as section 2:

"The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved."

The amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

In line 9 strike out the word "hereof" and insert "of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the next bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 19714) authorizing the President to sell and convey to the Republic of Panama the building situated in the city of Panama known as the "Administration Building."

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell and convey to the Republic of Panama the building situated in the city of Panama known as the "Administration Building," together with the ground on which the same is located, for a sum not less than $80,000, and the proceeds of such sale, if made, shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how much is this building worth?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I would not wish to put in the RECORD, if I can help it, a statement that we offered to sell a building to the Republic of Panama for more than it is worth, but I should say myself it is not worth more than $50,000. We are offering to sell this for not less than $80,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is speaking strictly of the building?

Mr. MANN. I am speaking of the building and the ground, with which I am quite familiar, although not in the sense of an expert real-estate dealer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How does the gentleman then fix $80,000 as the upset price?

Mr. MANN. I fix that on the statement of the Secretary of War and gentlemen in charge of the construction of the canal, who say that $80,000 is a fair price for the property. I suppose probably no one else would purchase it for any sort of a price except the Republic of Panama. The building is not of a character one could use for ordinary purposes at all. It was a building constructed by De Lesseps and was the administration building of the old Panama Canal Company, and was occupied shortly after we first went down there by Chief Engineer Wallace as a residence, and has never been occupied since except as a sort of storage for supplies for a few traps and things of that kind.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any possibility of its being used as an embassy? They are talking about buying embassies in different places.

Mr. MANN. Well, I think not. I think we can provide an embassy down there for a great deal less money than authorized here. I will say to the gentleman that the Secretary of War has suggested that there might be authority given to the Secretary of War to sell any property down there that we had acquired from the old Panama Canal Company and the proceeds might be paid into the fund for the construction of the canal. Subsequently, when objection was made to that, the suggestion was made that he be given authority to sell this particular administration building and that the money could be paid into the fund provided for the construction of the canal. The gentleman will see that the bill is not drawn in that way, but authorizes the President to make the sale, and so far as the resolution is concerned we have dealt with the President and not the Secretary of War, and it provides that the money, if the sale is made, shall be paid into the Treasury and not as part of the Panama Canal fund.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suppose the Panama Government desires to use this as a public building?

Mr. MANN. I think they do desire to use it for that purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman permit me to say, does not the gentleman realize that there is a very grave admission contained in an extract from the annual report of the Secretary of War, in which he says:

Upon an examination of the law I am of the opinion that the President had not the authority to dispose of this property without the sanction of Congress.

That is the very first time in that connection that this or the previous administration has ever admitted that the President could not do all and anything in connection with the administration of the Canal Zone, and I want to ask the gentleman whether it does not stultify all the arguments the gentleman has made on the floor concerning the whole subject of the Canal Zone?

Mr. MANN. Quite the contrary. No President has ever claimed any authority to sell any property upon the Canal Zone. We have had that matter up before. We passed a bill through Congress, which I think the gentleman himself voted for, although he has not voted for every proposition I have presented to the House concerning the Panama Canal, authorizing the sale of land down there for agricultural purposes; but this is for another purpose.

Mr. HARRISON. Did that pass the Senate?

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes; and is law. We have always contended, and it has been acquiesced in by the President—in fact, he has never claimed otherwise so far as real estate owned by us on the Panama strip is concerned, he has no control over it so far as the sale is concerned, except such as we give him by legislation.

Mr. HARRISON. Does the gentleman seriously believe that anybody, after the original bill he put through the House over our dead bodies, so to speak, would ever think it necessary to pass such a law as this with reference to anything?

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman and I look at things from different angles, sometimes. I do not see how anybody could read the bill and put any other construction upon it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Do we propose to sell any ground in connection with the building?

Mr. MANN. No ground except that on which the building stands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Is that in connection with the city of Panama, in the Republic of Panama?

Mr. MANN. This building is right in the city of Panama, on a prominent corner.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Has it ground all around the building?

Mr. MANN. It has no ground around or adjacent. It is part of a city lot that the Government owns—the building without any land around it.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. The Government owns the ground on which the building stands?

Mr. MANN. It owns the ground on which the building stands.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I believe the gentleman is one of those who says that where the flag is hoisted it shall never be hauled down; now he is proposing to sell ground of the United States. What excuse does the gentleman make?

Mr. MANN. I do not care to make any excuse, not even here.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Would the gentleman object to striking out "Panama" and inserting "Philippine Islands?" If you do I will not object to the bill.

Mr. MANN. I think I would not care to do that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Is there any statute by which the administration has the right to sell other property on the Canal Zone?

Mr. MANN. They have no right to sell any property on the Canal Zone except as we pass the laws to allow them to sell the real estate.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not mean real estate. I notice a contract has just been made for the sale of scrap on the zone.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I think they have that authority; they certainly exercise it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no objection to this bill; I think we ought to sell the property.

Mr. MANN. I think that is the opinion of everybody who is familiar with the matter.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill, and that it be considered in the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the consideration of the bill, and that the same be considered in the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

FISH HATCHERY AT PRESQUE ISLE PENINSULA, PENNSYLVANIA.

The next business reported from the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 12397) granting certain rights and privileges to the department of fisheries in the State of Pennsylvania.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the department of fisheries of the State of Pennsylvania is hereby granted the right to enter upon and occupy the following-described land of the United States, known as "Presque Isle Peninsula," in the county of Erie and State of Pennsylvania, to wit, all that part of said peninsula lying and being between the east line of the Erie waterworks lands and a line substantially parallel with and adjacent to the west line of the lands of the Presque Isle light-house, on the north shore of said peninsula, and the line of the present walk leading from said light-house to the north shore of Misery Bay, for the purpose of establishing and maintaining thereon a hatchery for the propagation of game and food fishes, and in pursuance thereof to improve the lands and ponds and reclaim marsh lands thereon; to construct buildings, houses, and sheds, and docks and approaches from Presque Isle Bay to said lands and to the ponds and hatchery buildings on said lands; to lay out, build, and maintain roads and walks in connection therewith, and plant trees and shrubs thereon for the preservation thereof: Provided, That the occupation and use of the said lands for the aforesaid purposes shall in no manner affect the right, title, and interest of the United States in and to said lands, nor the Government right of passage over and across the lands so occupied; and the said department of fisheries of the State of Pennsylvania shall do nothing on said lands that may injuriously affect the harbor of Erie or the peninsula of Presque Isle as a protection for the harbor: Provided further, That the United States shall not be liable for any damages whatsoever that may at any time occur to the improvements of the department of fisheries of Pennsylvania on said lands: And provided further, That the exercise of the rights hereby granted and the execution of any work on said lands hereby authorized shall be in accordance with such plans and specifications as may be approved by the Secretary of War and subject to such further stipulations and conditions as he may prescribe.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GILLETT). Is there objection?

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BATES].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to discharge the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill and that it be considered in the House. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BATES. Mr. Speaker, this bill is reported from the Committee on Military Affairs unanimously, and it came before that committee on a favorable report from the Engineer's Office of the War Department. It grants a right to the fish commission of the State of Pennsylvania to erect a fishery on the eastern portion of Presque Isle Peninsula, that peninsula being an arm of land of about 4½ miles in length, and forms Erie Harbor. It is proposed by the fish commission of Pennsylvania to erect a modern fish hatchery thereon for the propagation of game and food fishes. I think the object is a commendable one. In these days of high prices of beef, we in Pennsylvania propose to erect, possibly, the best fish hatchery in the country and show the balance of the world that Pennsylvania desires to do her full share in the supply of food products.

The title of this land is in the State of Pennsylvania, but for the purposes of national defense and harbor protection the right and custody of the same is in the United States Government and under the control of the Department of Engineers, and the favorable report has come from the Engineer Department and the Military Affairs Committee. The bill carries no appropriation, but confers upon the department of fisheries of Pennsylvania the right to use and occupy this portion of the peninsula (about 175 acres) to erect buildings, dredge pools and inlets, all, however, subject to the supervision and control of the Secretary of War. There can be no possible objection to such occupation, and the public-spirited bodies of citizens of Erie—the board of trade and chamber of commerce—promise to assist the enterprise to the fullest extent. The passage of this bill gives the opportunity for erecting one more splendid institution in Pennsylvania, and Erie, with her 70,000 people, will take a just pride in counting this hatchery as one of her institutions as well. I trust, therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the bill will pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the bill.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the further reading of the bill, and that the Committee of the Whole be discharged from further consideration of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. ANTHONY, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

BRIDGE ACROSS BLACK RIVER NEAR PAROQUET, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18806) to authorize the reconstruction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Black River near Paroquet, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the Black River near Paroquet, Ark., or to reconstruct, maintain, and operate the present bridge of said company across the said river in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressely reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following committee amendments were read, considered, and agreed to:

Strike out, in lines 5 and 6, the words "its successors and assigns, be, and they are," and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

Amend, in line 8, by inserting after the word "River" the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Black River near Paroquet, Ark."

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. FRANCIS RIVER NEAR PARKIN, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18807) to authorize the reconstruction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the St. Francis River near Parkin, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the St. Francis River near Parkin, Ark., or to reconstruct, maintain, and operate the present bridge of said company across the said river in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The following committee amendments were read, considered, and agreed to:

Strike out, in lines 5 and 6, the words "its successors and assigns, be, and they are," and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

Amend, in line 8, by inserting after the word "River" the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

Mr. MANN. I do not know that it is important, but there are some commas in there that ought to go out. After "Arkansas," in line 5, there is a comma which ought not to be there, and also after "hereby," in line 6. I ask unanimous consent to strike out those commas, and also the same in the bill last passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the commas designated by him in this bill and the previous bill be stricken out. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended to read: "A bill to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the St. Francis River near Parkin, Ark."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE WHITE RIVER AT AUGUSTA, ARK.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18808) to authorize the reconstruction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the White River at Augusta, Ark.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the St. Louis, Iron Mountain and Southern Railway Company, a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the States of Missouri and Arkansas, its successors and assigns, be, and they are hereby, authorized to construct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge and approaches thereto across the White River at Augusta, Ark., to reconstruct, maintain, and operate the present bridge of said company across the said river in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The following committee amendments were read, considered, and agreed to:

Strike out, in lines 5 and 6, the words "its successors and assigns, be, and they are," and insert in lieu thereof the word "is."

Amend, in line 8, by inserting after the word "River" the words "at a point suitable to the interests of navigation."

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended so as to read: "A bill to authorize the construction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the White River at Augusta, Ark."

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER AT KANSAS CITY, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 18592) to amend an act authorizing the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at Kansas City, Mo.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved February 20, 1907, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to amend an act to construct a bridge across the Missouri River at a point between Kansas City and Sibley, in Jackson County, Mo.,' approved March 19, 1904," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 2. That the construction of the bridge authorized to be constructed by the act approved March 3, 1887, and of which this act is amendatory, shall be completed within three years from March 19, 1910, and the time for so doing is hereby extended accordingly, and unless these conditions are complied with, this act and the acts of which it is amendatory shall be null and void: Provided, That in all matters and particulars not expressly provided for in the acts of which this act is amendatory, the construction, control, and use of such bridge shall be governed by the act of Congress approved March 23, 1906, entitled 'An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters.'

"SEC. 3. That the Congress reserves the right to change, alter, amend, or revise this act and the acts of which it is amendatory at any time."

The Clerk read the following committee amendments:

In line 12, page 2, strike out the word "act" and insert "acts."

In line 13, page 2, strike out the word "control" and insert the word "maintenance." Also strike out the word "use" and insert the word "operation."

In line 14, page 2, strike out the words "governed by" and insert the words "in accordance with the provisions of."

In line 18, page 2, strike out the words "the Congress reserves."

In line 19, page 2, strike out the word "change." Also strike out the word "revise" and insert "repeal."

In lines 19 and 20 strike out the words "at any time" and insert "is hereby expressly reserved."

Strike out the preamble.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask a question. I observe that the act authorizing this bridge to be built was passed in 1904, and this requires it to be completed in 1913, nine years thereafter. Why has it taken so long?

Mr. MANN. I may say to the gentleman from Wisconsin that it is a great deal worse than that. The original act for the construction of that bridge was passed in 1887. It has been extended from time to time until three years ago, and when this bill was presented the committee required evidence, a portion of which is printed in the report, giving the reason why this bill should be enacted. It seemed that originally the piers of the bridge were constructed, but for many years it was practically abandoned. There were troubles in reference to the erection of the bridge and troubles in reference to the ownership of the land on either side of the river. Now, the present parties who have it got an extension of time three years ago and have expended over $100,000. They have a number of contracts outstanding. They have recovered apparently from the stringency of the panic of 1907 and are preparing to go ahead with the construction of the bridge, a thing that the people are interested in.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. What kind of a bridge is it?

Mr. MANN. It is a railroad, foot passenger, and wagon bridge.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Thirty-three years is a long time.

Mr. MANN. No doubt about it. I propose to offer an amendment striking out the word "three," in line 6, and inserting the word "two," so that it will give them only two years more to complete the bridge instead of three years. Our rule is to give one year in which to commence the construction of a bridge and two years after that in which to complete it. So that we treat them now as though they had commenced the construction of the bridge and allow them two years more to complete it. There is no doubt that for many years this was a franchise that might be up for sale, and there was not much chance to sell it and not much chance to build the bridge. These people are now ready to go ahead, at least they make the claim that they are, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BORLAND] is satisfied that they are going ahead with the construction.

Mr. BORLAND. That is the only thing we wish to be assured of, that they are actually going ahead with the construction, and we are going to limit them to two years.

Mr. ANTHONY. I would like to ask the gentleman if this is the old Winner Bridge?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes.

Mr. ANTHONY. And they are actually at work on it now?

Mr. BORLAND. Yes; they are. It is now known as the Arnold, Burlington and Swift Terminal.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment:

In line 6, page 2, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "two."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The title was amended by striking out the preamble.

The question was taken, and the bill was passed.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider the votes whereby all the bills reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were passed, and to lay that motion on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to enter a motion to reconsider all the votes whereby the bills reported from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce were passed and to lay that motion on the table. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER AT ST. LOUIS, MO.

The next business on the Calendar for Unanimous Consent was the bill (H. R. 19399) to extend the time for the completion of the bridge across the Mississippi River at St. Louis, Mo., by the St. Louis Electric Bridge Company.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the time fixed by the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the St. Louis Electric Bridge Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Illinois, to construct a bridge across the Mississippi River," approved February 15, 1907, for the completion of the construction of the bridge therein authorized to be constructed is hereby extended one year.

SEC. 2. That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all of section 1 and insert the following:

"That the time for completing the construction of the bridge authorized by the act entitled 'An act providing for the construction of a bridge across the Mississippi River,' approved February 15, 1907, is hereby extended to one year from the date of the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MANN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had, on February 4, 1910, approved and signed bill of the following title:

H. R. 19548. An act prescribing certain provisions and conditions under which bonds and certificates of indebtedness of the United States may be issued, and for other purposes.

COMMITTEE ON THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. PARKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 377.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary shall have leave to sit during the sitting of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

MANUFACTURE OF SUBSIDIARY SILVER COIN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (H. Doc. No. 655), which was read and, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures and ordered printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I submit herewith a copy of a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, inclosing a memorandum and letter from the Director of the Mint relative to a modification of the deviations now allowed by law from the standard weight of the silver coins of the United States.

The Secretary of the Treasury approves of the suggestion of the Director of the Mint, and it is recommended by both that section 3536 of the Revised Statutes be amended by striking out the following words: "And in weighing a large number of pieces together, when delivered by the coiner to the superintendent, and by the superintendent to the depositor, the deviations from the standard weight shall not exceed two-hundredths of an ounce in one thousand dollars, half-dollars, or quarter-dollars, and one-hundredth of an ounce in one thousand dimes."

From the memorandum prepared by the Director of the Mint it is apparent that a saving in the manufacture of subsidiary silver coin would be effected by amending section 3536 of the Revised Statutes as proposed, and I recommend that favorable action be taken by Congress.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 7, 1910.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted—

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

By unanimous consent, reference of the bill (H. R. 19871) authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase certain lands adjoining the Frankfort Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa., was changed from the Committee on Military Affairs to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks this is of that class of special orders that are purely matters of ceremony and feels authorized in administering the rules to submit the request for unanimous consent. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The question was taken, and the resolution was agreed to.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, with Mr. TILSON in the chair.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States, in his special message transmitted to the Congress on January 10, 1910, recommended the enactment of a general law providing for the granting by the Federal Government of charters creating corporations to engage in interstate and foreign commerce.

It will be borne in mind that he does not recommend making it compulsory upon corporations to take out federal charters in order to engage in interstate and foreign commerce, but proposes to leave it to their own election.

If the policy recommended by the President be adopted, the Federal Government will have gone far beyond any point heretofore reached or seriously sought to be reached by it. It is a policy so sweeping in its character and so far-reaching in its intendment that the Congress surely will pause and give it exhaustive consideration before entering upon it. I beg the indulgence of the House to submit a brief review of some phases of the question in advance of the coming before us of bills from the committees having the recommendations in charge.

The President in his message has anticipated and sought to answer certain objections that would be urged to the scheme, saying:

> Such a national incorporation law will be opposed, first, by those who believe that trusts should be completely broken up and their property destroyed. It will be opposed, second, by those who doubt the constitutionality of such federal incorporation, and, even if it is valid, object to it as too great federal centralization. It will be opposed, third, by those who will insist that a merely voluntary incorporation like this will not attract to its acceptance the worst of the offenders against the antitrust statute and who will therefore propose instead of it a system of compulsory licenses for all federal corporations engaged in interstate commerce. (President's Message, Jan. 10, 1910.)

And he then proceeds to consider those objections in the order stated by him.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL QUESTION FIRST.

It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the second objection suggested by the President as likely to arise, or at least the first portion of it—the question of the constitutionality of it—deserves first consideration, because that is a question of principle; the others may be classed as questions of policy. If such an act be unconstitutional, of course that is the end of it; if not, then we may consider the other phases and effects as matters of policy upon their respective merits.

Let us then turn to this, and let us bear strictly in mind just what is proposed. It is that Congress pass a general law authorizing the granting of charters of incorporation to private business associations desiring to carry on interstate commerce; it is not to authorize the creation of corporations that are to perform some governmental function, as, for instance, a bank with authority to issue currency, or a public highway, such as a railroad or canal, but purely private business concerns engaged wholly in private business for private profit, performing no public service, exercising no governmental function whatsoever.

Let us remember just here that there is a distinction as wide as the poles between this proposition and that which has been much agitated of a system of federal licenses or federal registry of associations engaged in interstate and foreign commerce. While I grant that much may be said upon each side of the latter proposition, still it is wholly different in its constitutional aspects from the former. The President proposes that the Federal Government be clothed with authority to create a new entity, a new commercial agency; in the other it is a form of regulation of those already in existence or hereafter to be created by the sovereign States.

Let us also remember that the corporations to be created under the proposed policy will be entirely different in character from those created under authority of Congress in the District of Columbia and in the Territories. These corporations, though created by federal authority, bear the same relations to all others and to the governments, State and Federal, as those created by the States. They are "citizens" of the District or of the Territory, as the case may be. Those created under the President's policy will be federal corporations. They will not be citizens of any State or Territory or of the District of Columbia. They will have a legal status wholly different from individuals or joint-stock companies or partnerships engaged in similar activities; wholly different from state corporations engaged in precisely similar work. They will have legal rights, immunities, and privileges which individuals acting as individuals can never attain.

Mr. Chairman, the second section of the sixth article of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof; and all treaties made, or which shall be made, under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land; and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

If, therefore, such federal corporations as the President advocates can be created, they will, under this section, as it has again and again been interpreted and applied by the courts, be supreme above state regulation and law. They can enter a State without so much as saying "by your leave," and carry on their business, their agents snapping their fingers contemptuously at state law and rules. The States can have no authority, can exercise no control, can impose no terms save such as the discretion and grace of the Federal Government allow them. "If it please you, O Federal Government," the States must say, "we would do this or that, make this regulation or that for your creatures, your corporations that have been given life by your law; if it please you not, however, why, not our will, nor our wisdom, but yours be exercised." How vast the sweep of the proposed policy! How tremendous the change which will be wrought if it be consummated!

A corporation may be formed having its place of business in the State of Massachusetts but desiring to cross the border and do business in New Hampshire. By taking a federal charter it will escape any regulation of New Hampshire, except such as the discretion of the Congress of the United States may permit that State to have. The judgment of representatives from Tennessee and Georgia, from California and Oregon, from 44 other States must be substituted for that of the citizens of New Hampshire.

In passing, let me say, Mr. Chairman, that if we are to have any such incorporation I quite agree that it should be under a general law, and only under a general law. There should be no special acts of Congress granting charters to particular associations for special purposes. Gentlemen may remember that during my brief service here I have frequently protested against the passage of special bills granting charters of incorporation to District associations, simply on the ground that we ought not to pass such special acts. I am glad to see that we have fewer of these than formerly. If we are to have this general policy, by all means let it be under a general law, but let us consider well before we have it at all.

VOLUNTARY FEATURE MAKES NO CHANGE IN CONSTITUTIONAL ASPECT.

One other matter to bear in mind in considering the constitutionality of the question is that leaving it optional with an association whether it will take a federal charter or receive its life from a State, has no bearing whatsoever.

Where the Federal Government may go, the Federal Government can go, so far as the Constitution is concerned. In other respects the voluntary feature of the proposition is a matter of great moment, but the constitutional question is unaffected by it.

If the Federal Government may constitutionally pass an act permitting a charter at the election of an association, I apprehend it could go further and say that, in order to engage in interstate commerce at all, the association, if it be a corporation, must be a federal corporation, must have a federal charter. If it can go that far, could it not go still further and say, if Congress, in its discretion should determine to do so, that only incorporations should have the right to engage in interstate trade?

At any rate, in my view of the matter, the voluntary feature does not affect the fundamental legal phase. But whether it does or not, I shall undertake to maintain that the proposed legislation lies beyond the limit of federal authority.

The President, in answer to the constitutional objection which he anticipated would be urged, says:

> Second. There are those who doubt the constitutionality of such federal incorporation. The regulation of interstate and foreign commerce is certainly conferred in the fullest measure upon Congress; and if, for the purpose of securing in the most thorough manner that kind of regulation, Congress shall insist that it may provide and authorize agencies to carry on that commerce, it would seem to be within its power. This has been distinctly affirmed with respect to railroad companies doing an interstate business and interstate bridges. Why, then, with respect to any other form of interstate commerce, like the sale of goods across state boundaries and into foreign commerce, may the same power not be asserted?

The President might have added that, in the exercise of another power, the Congress created a corporation to engage in the banking business, becoming a partner in the concern, and this was sustained by the courts after what was probably the greatest legal battle in the history of the Republic.

But, Mr. Chairman, there is a vast difference, a difference which all lawyers and most laymen must appreciate, between the nature and functions of an institution which issues currency or a substitute for currency for use in exchanging commodities and values, and one which manufactures commodities to be exchanged. And there is an equal difference between the nature and functions of a railroad or canal or bridge—a public highway constructed for the transportation and passage of persons and things—and a trading company engaged in private commerce for private gain.

The fact that the motive of those who engage in banking activities or in the construction and operation of railroads is precisely the same as the motive actuating those who sell groceries or weave the cotton fiber into clothing—that is, to make money—does not change the essential character of the businesses themselves. The test is the nature of the work in which the corporation is to engage, as that work is related to the public service or the exercise of some governmental function, and not the motives of the individuals who compose the association.

To determine whether the Federal Government has power to create a corporation we must look to the business in which that corporation is to engage. If it is to be an agency created as a matter of convenience to carry on some activity which the Government itself might engage in directly in the exercise of some one of its delegated powers, then, under the well-settled and often-reiterated decisions of the courts the Federal Government is empowered to create it; but if it is to be a private business concern carrying on no governmental work, exercising purely private functions, then, sir, there is no precedent for the Federal Government creating such an one, and it will be violative of the Constitution for it to do so.

SOME LEAVES FROM HISTORY.

In the convention which framed the Constitution Mr. Madison, of Virginia, often referred to as the "Father of the Constitution," and Mr. Pinckney, of South Carolina, on August 20, 1787, each submitted to the convention a proposal that the Congress be clothed with the power to create corporations. The proposition of Mr. Madison was in the following words:

> Congress shall have power to grant charters of corporation in cases where the public good may require them and the authority of a single State may be incompetent.

The proposition of Mr. Pinckney was simply—

> Congress shall have power to grant charters of incorporation.

These proposals were first referred to the committee on detail (see the Madison Papers) and were never heard of in that form again, so far as any records of the convention show. Other proposals made by these gentlemen at the same time and referred to that committee were favorably acted upon by the committee and by the convention, and are in the Constitution today. This was rejected.

Three days before the convention adjourned, however, Mr. Madison brought forward another proposition which I shall undertake to show was much more restricted than his first proposal. Dr. Benjamin Franklin on that day, September 14, 1787, as the Constitution was being whipped into final shape, moved to add, after the words "post-roads," section 8 of Article I (that being the section granting to Congress the power to establish post-roads), a power "to provide for cutting canals where deemed necessary," and Mr. Madison then suggested an enlargement of the motion into a power "to grant charters of incorporation where the interest of the United States might require, and the legislative provisions of individual States may be incompetent."

Gentlemen will observe the wide difference in the two propositions submitted by Mr. Madison. In the first it was proposed to authorize Congress to create corporations where the public good might require, and in the last where the interest of the United States might require. It is quite clear to my mind that had his first proposition prevailed, Congress might, in its discretion, have incorporated even trading companies, and it is equally clear that in the last Mr. Madison meant the Government of the United States. It was so regarded at the time in the convention, as the debate on it, to be found in the Madison Papers, show. It was suggested by some one that Congress already had the power, meaning, of course, the power to grant a charter of incorporation to a company which was exercising some function of the United States Government. Others denied this, and Mr. Madison himself, in the first constitutional debate had in the Congress after the Government was formed, took the position that it had not. No one ever suggested in convention, so far as the records show, that the Congress had any such power as would have been granted by Mr. Madison's first proposal.

But, Mr. Chairman, even his last proposal to grant the power to create a corporation for governmental purposes failed. The motion was so modified as to permit a vote upon the canal proposition alone, and the vote was 8 States against to 3 in favor, and the Madison amendment, of course, failed with the original. The matter was not again brought before the convention, and the Constitution, without this power to create corporations even for governmental purposes being expressly granted, went to the States for the ratification or rejection of their people.

I have searched the records of the debates in the various state conventions held for the purpose of passing upon the ratification of the instrument with such diligence as I could to find if any discussion was there had of this specific matter, and strange to say, I find nothing bearing upon it or that tends to throw any light upon the question of how it was viewed in those assemblies.

It seems rather remarkable that this matter was not touched upon in some of those searching and luminous discussions, but we must bear in mind that at that time corporations, as we now understand them, scarcely existed.

According to an article appearing some seven or eight years ago as one of a series of "Yale Bicentennial Publications" there were during the days of colonial government but six corporations in all the colonies that were of strictly American origin. There were, of course, a number in existence as monopolies granted by the English Crown. The first corporation of a business character owing its franchise purely to American sovereignty was the bank established through the efforts of Robert Morris, to aid in financing the Revolutionary war. From 1775, when the Confederation was formed, to the time of the adoption of the Constitution there were just 20 business corporations organized by the several States, and 11 of these were navigation companies. A very great prejudice existed in all the States against the granting of charters of incorporation. Even in New York the powerful genius of Hamilton, reinforced by the sagacity of Livingston, could not overcome it.

It is interesting to note that the State of North Carolina took the first advanced step and "gave the modern world an object lesson in political science." In 1795 she offered incorporation for business purposes freely on equal terms to any who desired it. It was the first time that a sovereign power had done this since the beginning of the Roman Empire. Her offer was confined first to the construction of canals. Prior to this time the charters granted by sovereign powers had been almost exclusively in the nature of monopolies and had been granted by special acts of legislative bodies or by the crowns. The general laws had been restricted to the formation of charitable, religious, or literary corporations.

Is it conceivable, Mr. Chairman, that the people of the sovereign States ever intended to delegate to the new Government a power which they had scarcely exercised through their own state governments—the charter of trading companies?

At any rate, sir, the Constitution was ratified without this power being expressly given, without it having ever been proposed, save as proposed by Madison and Pinckney.

THE BANK A GOVERNMENTAL AGENCY.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the gentleman permit an inquiry there?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Do the debates of those days reveal whether Madison proposed to give the Congress the power to require corporations doing interstate-commerce business to take out charters of that sort or was there any consideration of the voluntary feature as proposed in the President's message?

Mr. GARRETT. None whatever.

I need not enter here upon a review of the debates in regard to the establishment of the national bank. Gentlemen are familiar with the outcome. The bank was established, ran its course, and was later rechartered. Under this second charter the question of constitutional power was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States, and the result was the great opinion in the case of McCulloch v. Maryland, in which the power was sustained. But I beg gentlemen to remember that it was upheld wholly because the bank was to exercise a governmental function, was to be an agent of the Government and do for it what the Government might have itself done directly. Certainly it will not be insisted that that great decision with all its wealth of learning goes further than this. Congress did not create the bank in order to regulate it, but in order that it might perform a governmental duty. In the power to create a bank, then, the advocates of a federal corporation law for private trading companies can find no support.

PUBLIC HIGHWAYS.

Coming to the incorporation of interstate highway companies, canal companies, and bridge companies, let us examine briefly the history of this and try to find the principle upon which the action rests.

I believe the first railway company to be created as a federal corporation—of course there were some created as corporations of the District of Columbia earlier—was the Union Pacific. Gentlemen who will take the trouble to investigate the original act passed July 1, 1862, will find that it was not created as an interstate corporation but as an interterritorial one. So far as the Union Pacific Company was concerned, it was only given the right to build from a point in the then Territory of Nebraska, through other Territories, to the western line of the Territory of Nevada. The act then authorized the Leavenworth, Pawnee and Northern Railroad Company, a corporation of the State of Kansas, to build to the beginning end of the line, and authorized the Central Pacific Company, a corporation of the State of California, to join to the Union Pacific line at the western line of the Territory of Nevada and make the road continuous through to San Francisco.

As the bill originally was proposed, it was to authorize the construction through the States of Kansas and California, but even in that bitter hour, amid the awful throes of the war of secession, when the expression "states rights" was about the most unpleasant which could fall upon the ears of the statesmen then controlling the destinies of the Union, the Congress would not invade the States to build even an interstate highway, notwithstanding the military and postal necessities, and under the lead of Senator Trumbull, of Illinois, the bill was amended so as to confine the authority of the corporation being created to the territory of the United States out of which no States had been created. (Acts 37th Cong., pp. 493–494.)

In 1864, by act of July 2, the Northern Pacific Railroad Company was chartered as a federal incorporation. It authorized the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from some point on Lake Superior in Minnesota or Wisconsin to a point on Puget Sound. Gentlemen who will take the trouble to examine that act will find that section 18 of it provides expressly that the said company should obtain from the States through which it was to run permission before entering them to build. (Acts 38th Cong., p. 372.)

An examination of the act of July 27, 1866, chartering the Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company, will disclose that the same condition as to securing the consent of those States through which it was run was imposed, and that the consent was had from California and Missouri through legislative acts. Texas was then under military government. The same is true as to the Texas and Pacific Railroad Company, chartered by act of Congress as a federal incorporation March 3, 1871.

So far as the interstate railways are concerned, the authority of the States has been always recognized.

It was not until 1875, in the case of Kohl v. United States (97 U. S., 367), that the right of the eminent domain was held to belong to the Federal Government. When the Pacific railroads were chartered by Congress this power had never been exercised. They were chartered as territorial corporations and sent to the States to obtain state permission under state terms to cross their bounds.

These so-called "Pacific railroads" are, I believe, the only ones that have been chartered as federal incorporations by the Congress.

It would seem, therefore, that the President, distinguished jurist though he has been and learned lawyer though he is, is not wholly fortunate in citing these as precedents to justify the federal incorporation of trading companies, even if there were not an intrinsic and inherent difference in the character of a corporation engaged in building public highways and one engaged in manufacturing soap or selling sewing machines.

BRIDGES AND CANALS.

This brings us to the interstate bridge companies and perhaps the canal companies, among others the Lake Erie and Ohio River Canal Company, fathered by the Fifty-ninth Congress at its first session, my distinguished friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL], being chief sponsor at its birth.

It is true that since the power of eminent domain was held to belong to the Federal Government in the Kohl case, which I have cited, decided in 1875, the Congress has authorized the construction of bridges over navigable waters within state territory and across interstate streams, granting the power of eminent domain, and in at least one instance has granted a charter of incorporation for that purpose, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Luxton v. North River Bridge Company (153 U. S., 524), has upheld the right.

It is also true that at least one canal company, the one already referred to, has been chartered as a federal incorporation. I believe it has not yet gotten into the courts.

Assuming for the purposes of this argument that the grant of power to the canal company was constitutional and that, under the decision in the Luxton case, the Federal Government might go further than it ever went in the railroad-incorporation bills, and might charter them and give them authority to enter States without State permission, let us turn to the principle upon which such can be upheld and see if there be any difference between these and trading companies engaged in private business and doing no public service.

Mr. Chairman, in every civilized country in history the construction and maintenance of highways for the use of citizens has been a governmental function, and it is true in our own. We have many kinds in this country, but they may be roughly divided into four classes: First and most common, the ordinary public roads of the country and streets of the towns and cities; second, the streams and bodies of water that are capable of being navigated; third, the artificial waterways which we call canals; and, fourth and most modern, the railways.

The ordinary public roads in the States belong to the States or counties or other political subdivisions, being held in trust by them for the use of the public. In establishing and maintaining these it has been of most frequent occurrence for them to be given in charge to corporations created by the State. I suppose all the older States and many of the new ones have had and may still have turnpike companies. These companies are corporations created by the State, charged with fixed duties of public service, and clothed with authority to charge certain tolls for the passage of persons and things.

States and counties, too, have leased ferriage rights across navigable waters.

The same is true as to canal companies.

Such corporations created for the performance of public service have been under direct and immediate governmental control—a control more searching and intimate than in any case of a corporation organized to conduct private business, because their duties and nature and relation to the public are essentially different. In the one case, the corporation is to exercise governmental functions for private gain. In the other, the corporation is to conduct private business, perform purely private functions for private gain.

As for the streams naturally navigable, they belong, so far as their navigable qualities are concerned, to the governments, State and Federal, as trustees for the public. It is not necessary to enter now into the refinements and intricacies of the respective jurisdiction of State and federation since a reminder of the general principle is sufficient to indicate the point I am seeking to make clear. The governments may improve these directly or they may authorize individuals to do so or they may create corporations to do so.

RAILWAYS AND BRIDGES PUBLIC HIGHWAYS.

Now, the railway and the bridge are public highways, technical in character, it is true; but simply highways as are the country roads, the city streets, the navigable waters, and the railway with its freight and passenger rates is precisely the same so far as its fundamental legal character is concerned as the turnpike company with its tollgates. The State, in the exercise of its sovereign power, may construct and maintain them unless something in its constitution prevents, or it may create a corporation to do so.

The State, however, can not go beyond its own borders.

The Federal Government was given the power to establish and maintain post-roads by express delegation, and it has the right to establish avenues for the transportation and movement of its military forces and stores. It may establish them directly or it may create corporations to do it since those corporations are to do governmental work.

The debates on the bills creating the railroad companies as federal incorporations, Mr. Chairman, were bottomed wholly on the post-roads clause, the military necessities, and the right of the Government to grant concessions through its own territory over which it held absolute sovereignty for all purposes. Gentlemen will find the commerce clause scarcely referred to there. The interstate bridges and canals may be sustained upon precisely the same basis.

Such corporations are public; they perform public work, exercise governmental functions.

THUS FAR, BUT NO FURTHER.

We are all agreed that thus far the Federal Government may go under the express powers given it together with the necessary implications arising, but further than this it has not gone, nor can it, in my opinion, constitutionally go.

The Federal Government has never created a federal corporation to do anything, to conduct any business, to perform any service, which the Government itself might not have done directly, nor may it do so.

The States have and the States may. Why? Because the creation of corporations is an act of sovereignty. Sovereignty rests not in the States, not in the United States, but in the people. The people created the federal entity as the agency for the execution of certain sovereign powers. To the States, the governmental forces already in existence, they retained all powers and rights and duties not delegated. The States possessed the power to create corporations before the Constitution was even a dream. This power was not delegated. Certain specific powers were and for the execution of those powers the Federal Government may create a corporation, if that corporation is to perform functions which the Federal Government itself might perform directly. That is the limit of its authority, the terminus of its constitutional power.

Surely the doctrine in McCulloch v. Maryland extends no further than this. Surely all the subsequent decisions as to railways and bridges and canals do not carry the law beyond this point. Surely the most liberal constructionist of the Constitution must pause before going further.

If this principle is correct, if the Federal Government may not create a corporation to engage in any activity in which the Government itself may not engage, then let us apply it to the policy proposed by the President, and what is the conclusion?

I take it that no man here or elsewhere would insist for a moment that under our Constitution the Federal Government could enter into, say, the wholesale grocery business, buying and selling in the marts of the States and the world for commercial gain. A suggestion that it attempt to do so under the present Constitution would be set down as preposterous and make its author the laughing stock of the Republic.

Would anyone say that under the power to regulate commerce the Federal Government could engage in the manufacture and sale of farming implements, of engines, of clothing? To ask the question is to answer it. If it can not, then can it, being a government of delegated powers, create a corporation and clothe it with authority to do that which it may not do itself?

The States may, of course. But the States are not governments of delegated powers. They can create trading corporations; they can clothe them with power to engage in activities in which the State may not be able to engage; they can impose the conditions upon which the corporations of other States may do business in their borders. But they did not by express terms delegate this authority to the federal organism.

To my mind it is inconceivable that in granting the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce it lay within the thought of the people of the States to delegate to the new entity being created by them the authority to organize corporations that might enter those States without state permission to do, not governmental business, but private business without reference to the State's regulation and control.

A power to regulate is not the power to produce, nor is it, by any fair construction, the power to create agencies of production.

Gentlemen must not forget that the courts have held that manufacture is not commerce. A long line of consistent decisions of the Supreme Court sustains this assertion again and again. The case of Kidd v. Pierson (128 U. S., 1), the Knight case (156 U. S., 1), the case of Coe v. Errol (116 U. S., 571), the Addystone Pipe and Steel Company case (211 U. S., 246), and others will prove of interest to gentlemen who care to go further into this question.

The President's proposition, then, is not to regulate commerce, but to regulate those engaged in commerce in so far as they happen to be corporations. It is at least one degree removed from the commerce clause of the Constitution. If the Supreme Court has been correct in its long unbroken line of decisions that manufacture is not commerce, how, then, can the Federal Government regulate manufacture or manufacturers? There is no delegation of authority to do that. It lies beyond the domain of constitutional action. The Federal Government is one not of excepted but of delegated powers. Some gentlemen seem to act upon the theory that it may do anything not denied; it can, in fact, do only those things that are allowed it in the chart.

Creating corporations as federal creatures that may enter sovereign States in disregard of state wish or regulation and do private business is not one of the delegated powers.

Mr. Chairman, for the Members of the Congress individually and collectively I entertain the greatest respect. Differing, as I do, radically from many of them upon governmental questions, great and small, I know their ability, their character, and concede them, in the main, proper conceptions of justice. I do not doubt that future Congresses will maintain the high order of those past and present, but, sir, as one Representative of my State, and speaking for those of its people who have honored me, I can not for them agree that the discretion of any Congress shall be substituted for their own as to the terms and conditions upon which corporations may enter her sovereign confines and do business with her citizens.

I do not ask to aid in fixing conditions for other States. I protest against them being fixed by outsiders for my own.

To the extent of such ability as I have, therefore, I shall oppose the proposed policy of the President.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. GARRETT. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. If Congress has the power to charter railroad corporations doing interstate business, would not Congress have the power to tax the railroads doing similar business not having a national charter and thereby impose a coercive tax similar to that imposed upon the state banks?

Mr. GARRETT. That may be true. I am inclined to think it would, but my colleague sees the point I am trying to make. I concede the power of Congress to create interstate railroad corporations. I concede that power for the purposes of this argument, but would prefer not to go into collateral details such as the question of my colleague suggests, because of the time limit under which I am speaking.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. I would like to ask the gentleman one question. I was exceedingly interested in the gentleman's argument, and here is one question which has occurred to me: In relating the case of McCulloch against Maryland and the United States Bank the gentleman stated that McCulloch against Maryland sustained the bank charter upon the ground they chartered the bank for governmental purposes and to perform a governmental function. Did not that bank have the power to discount notes?

Mr. GARRETT. It did.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. That is not a government function.

Mr. GARRETT. But the main power of that bank was a governmental function.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. But it did a private business, notwithstanding.

Mr. GARRETT. Yes; it did a private business to some extent, but that was not the main purpose of the bank, and I think what I have said will be borne out by a rereading of the opinion in that case.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. The gentleman's argument, then, is that the charter having been granted for functions purely governmental, the merely incidental fact that bills were discounted by the bank did not invalidate the charter.

Mr. GARRETT. The court held not.

Mr. Chairman, I have devoted my efforts to-day almost exclusively to the constitutional question involved, deeming that, as I said in the beginning, of first importance. On some future day I may again ask the indulgence of the House to discuss some of the other phases of the policy. A wide field is opened here for our investigation—questions that loom so large as to challenge most solemn consideration before action is had. The opportunities that will be offered under the President's plan for consolidation—why, sir, it seems to be almost a proposition to undo all that the courts have done in monopoly repression; the jurisdiction of the courts over federal incorporations; the respective merits of state and federal control and of the joint system of control as against the single system which is proposed by the President—all these and other phases must be thoroughly thrashed out and scrutinized with exceeding great care ere we proceed.

But for the present I wish to emphasize but one other thought—that which was stated a few moments ago. This is not a proposition to regulate commerce; it is a proposition to regulate a specific class of the many classes of agencies engaged in commerce. It proposes to use the commerce clause as a means to reach an end which can not be reached directly. That, I take it, everyone will concede. It is a proposition to use the commerce clause to reach another business related to but not itself coming within the scope of that clause. It is a proposition to use a subterfuge, to evade, by a stretching of the commerce clause of the Constitution, the tenth amendment, which the people in their zeal for protecting state power demanded, the amendment which put into direct expression the principle:

The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people.

It is the age-old cry for power; the age-old spirit which has moved men and nations to cunning, to revolution, to bloodletting. It is the power lust which the fathers sought to curb.

Mr. Chairman, I know quite well that almost all men are inclined to be more liberal in their construction of the Constitution of these United States than most men were in the earlier days of the Republic. Many who then were deemed liberal would now be classed as strict constructionists. This spirit has in a large measure permeated the people. It is due, of course, mainly to the result of the war of secession. The moral effects of that result went far beyond the immediate question which was at stake in the contest—that of the right of a State to secede—and ever since it was ended there has been a growing tendency to intensify and centralize federal power by ingenious and farfetched activities, by legislative manipulation, and judicial construction.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. Right in that connection I want to ask you if it is not proposed to create this agency, in addition to regulation?

Mr. GARRETT. It is to authorize the creation in order to regulate them.

Sir, it will be said that if this policy prevails in Congress, notwithstanding that it is not a proposition in fact to regulate commerce but to regulate those engaged in commerce, yet being based upon the commerce clause the courts, under the well-settled rule that they can not inquire into the motives of the legislative body, may sustain it.

Even if that be true, sir, I submit to gentlemen that we legislators have a responsibility to the Constitution of our own, a responsibility sealed by our solemn oaths to support it and defend it, to "bear true faith and allegiance to the same." We must examine our motives, and if, in our judgment, a proposition violate the organic law in letter or in spirit we dare not yield it our support.

The war of secession modified the Constitution indeed, but it did not destroy it nor release its binding force and obligations. It stands to-day as potent, as forceful, and as binding as when it came fresh from the hands of the fathers, wrought by their lively genius, sanctified by their labors and their loves.

The Constitution, sir, is not a dead thing to be kicked with contempt from our pathway or trodden with ruthless roughness into the dust beneath our feet. It is a living thing, a vital organism, the shield of our past, with its passion and power; the shelter of our present, with its prayer and its praise; the sheet anchor of our future, with its dread and its dreams. Let us "the true faith and allegiance" keep unto its letter and its spirit, the great faith we owe to all that is and all that is to be. [Loud general applause.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. GAINES having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19255, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

FORMATION OF CORPORATIONS.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Yesterday upon the introduction of what is known as the "national incorporation act" objection was made to the second reading. I ask that the bill be read the second time and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (S. 6186) to provide for the formation of corporations to engage in interstate and international trade and commerce was read the second time by its title.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I believe I made a motion yesterday that the bill be referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I think at the time the Senator made his motion my motion was pending.

Mr. NEWLANDS. I do not understand the Senator.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I understand that I made a motion on introducing the bill that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I think my motion will take precedence of the Senator's motion.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, it makes little difference as to who made the motion. The question is as to the committee jurisdiction over the bill. This bill, for the national incorporation of enterprises engaged in interstate commerce, is an economic measure. Its name indicates its purpose. It has been introduced pursuant to a message of the President calling attention to the evils of corporate monopoly and advising national action upon the subject for the purpose of preserving the good features and suppressing the bad features of industrial combination.

The jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee and of the Interstate Commerce Committee is indicated by their names. The Judiciary Committee, as its name indicates, has jurisdiction over all matters relating to the judiciary, the organization and the procedure of the courts, the framing of a penal code, matters of constitutional law, and other questions of such nature. The Interstate Commerce Committee has jurisdiction over the entire subject of interstate commerce as declared in our Constitution and embraced within the power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. It is a committee which is intended to take hold of the phases of this question that relate to public policy and economics. This bill is intended to meet the economic situation. It involves questions relating to the interstate trade of the enormous aggregations of capital known as the "trusts," and the Interstate Commerce Committee has jurisdiction of it.

The President in his recent message on "Interstate commerce and antitrust laws and federal incorporation," the title of his message, presented two general measures for the consideration of Congress. One related entirely to that branch of interstate commerce relating to transportation. The other referred to that portion of interstate commerce that related to trade. With reference to interstate transportation the President advised the organization of a commerce court, and also advised amendments of and additions to the interstate-commerce act relating to the initiative of proceedings to condemn a rate, to the classification of rates, to the pooling of railroad companies, and other matters of that kind.

An administration bill prepared pursuant to this portion of the message was introduced by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. Yet that bill itself, while relating to many of the economic features of interstate commerce and the administrative procedure of the Interstate Commerce Commission, provided also for a court of commerce. We have therefore this contradiction, that the bill which related to the organization of a court of commerce was referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and a bill relating purely to the economics of the trade question is sought to be referred to the Judiciary Committee. One would have thought that a strict compliance with the jurisdiction of these two committees would have demanded that the bill relating to the court should be referred to the Judiciary Committee, and bills relating to the economic phases of or questions of public policy relating to interstate commerce should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee.

The Senator from Wyoming insisted when he presented this bill that it involved a constitutional question as to whether or not the National Government has the power to create corporations for the purpose of engaging in foreign or interstate trade.

I submit that no such objection can be seriously urged. It is too late to-day to say that Congress, possessing full power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce, is denied the power to create the artificial beings that engage in such commerce. It has already been held with reference to the banks that under this and other powers national banks can be created, and they have been created. It has already been held that under the interstate-commerce power Congress has the right to create national corporations for the purpose of engaging in interstate transportation. This has been clearly and unequivocally decided; and if Congress has the power to create corporations for the purpose of engaging in one form of interstate commerce it has the power to create corporations for engaging in the other.

So far as I am individually concerned, I have repeatedly during the past four or five years urged upon Congress the wisdom of creating national corporations for interstate transportation. I have urged the passage of a law that will permit the incorporation of great trunk lines from ocean to ocean and from the Lakes to the Gulf, providing for national control as to capitalization and dividends, providing an insurance fund for employees against accident and the disabilities of age, providing a uniform method of taxation by the States, and subjecting such corporations except as to purely federal questions to the jurisdiction of state courts, subjecting them to the control of the police laws of the States, and subjecting them in purely state commerce to the regulation of the States themselves. This measure, protecting alike the interest of investors, employees, and shippers, is now pending in the Senate and has been referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee. The jurisdiction of that committee was recognized by the Senate over the subject-matter so far as it related to interstate transportation. Why should it be denied with reference to interstate trade?

So far as the industrial aspect of this matter is concerned, I approach it with an absolutely open mind, but so far as the law or the constitutionality of the question is concerned, my judgment is made up. The power clearly exists. I have an open mind simply as to the economic necessity for a national incorporation of trade corporations, as to whether it is better for the Nation itself to create the instrumentalities that are to enter into this trade or simply to license existing corporations organized under state law upon compliance with the regulation and control imposed by a national law, forbidding them to engage in interstate or foreign commerce except upon such terms as are imposed by the law itself. These are the only questions that are really to be considered by Congress relating to this matter. It is not a question of the Constitution, it is not a question relating to the judiciary or judicial procedure, but a question of method, a question of policy, a question of economics relating to interstate commerce.

Now, what are the questions of policy and economics which will be involved? First will come up the question as to whether or not it is wise to organize these corporations at all, and second, whether it is wise to make the law cover all corporations, big or little. If I were inclined to acquiesce in a national law relating to interstate trade, I should hesitate to take hold of the numerous small corporations in the country engaged in both state and interstate trade and subject them to the provisions of a national law.

Our purpose is simply to meet the abuses of these great capitalistic organizations, the abuses of monopoly, and the restraint of trade, and in order to accomplish that purpose it is not essential that we should take hold of the numerous small corporations of the country.

So I would confine the operations of the national law, if practicable, to corporations whose capitalization or whose income is in excess of a certain amount, so that the regulating power of the Government would be applied only to those combinations and organizations whose practices are pernicious in the interstate trade of the country. That is an economic question, a question of policy, not a question to be considered by the Judiciary Committee, but a question to be considered by the Interstate Commerce Committee.

I am sure that I have no disposition to intrude upon the jurisdiction of the Judiciary Committee. We have the highest respect for it and for its membership. But, I submit, it should be confined to its jurisdiction, and the matters properly entitled to the consideration of the Interstate Commerce Commitee should go to that committee.

Now, there is another question that we will have to meet. If, under the power to regulate interstate commerce, we take hold of these great combinations, we must regulate their pernicious practices or exercise such control over their capitalization, their dividends, or their charges as to make oppression of the people impossible. If we wish to regulate and control pernicious practices, then it might be advisable to organize in the Interstate Commerce Commission two departments—one department relating to transportation, the other department relating to trade, giving the department relating to trade the same power over interstate trade as is now exercised by the Interstate Commerce Commission with reference to transportation.

In this way, without either incorporating or licensing the various combinations and monopolies of the country, we will put them under the control of an administrative tribunal that will slowly and gradually, without revolutionary process, work a correction of the pernicious practices of which the people complain, at the same time preserving all the economic advantage that comes from large capitalization and combination of plants. That is an economic question. That is a question of policy. If we do not wish to pursue that course, then will come up the question of national incorporation or of national license, a question of policy, not a question of Constitution or of law.

Mr. President, with reference to this great question, it is entirely clear that we must either permit the courts to pursue their present course under the Sherman antitrust law, rendering decrees destroying these great combinations, dissolving them into their original elements, and thus restoring the principle of free competition with perhaps its attendant evils of industrial readjustment, overproduction, and strikes, or we will have to sanction these great combinations and place them under practical control. If these combinations become so powerful as to be able to fix prices, if they become so powerful that they can absolutely destroy their competitors by lowering the price in the field of competition and maintaining it or increasing it in the field of their monopoly; if they have such power and we propose to regulate and not to destroy them, then it logically follows that the regulation must be as ample and as complete as that over the public utilities of the country.

Gas companies, water companies, electric-light companies are not public utilities simply because they cover water and light and gas. They are public utilities because they have all the attributes of monopoly, necessarily so from the very nature of their organization. So the law takes hold of them and regulates their charges.

In the same way, when the production and the furnishing of any commodity comes under monopolistic control or a control tending to monopoly, the same power attaches to the Nation in interstate commerce and the States in state commerce to control the capitalization, to control the dividends, and even to fix the price itself as the States now have relating to gas, water, and electricity. The Government, National and State, each within its jurisdiction, can, if the monopoly exists, fix the price of coal, and oil, and steel, and iron just as completely as the States and municipalities fix the price of gas or water or electricity; and the only question which Congress will have to consider will be one of policy, as to whether it will go so far as to fix the prices in interstate trade or whether it will limit its control simply to capitalization and dividends, through the latter exercising a controlling power over prices, but leaving the corporation itself a large range of discretion.

Mr. President, these are the economic questions, the questions of policy, that come up in the consideration of this bill. If there is any great constitutional question upon which the Senate seeks advice, it may be referred to the Judiciary Committee, to which it belongs, but I do not believe there is such a question. We have only questions of policy and of economics to consider; and the Interstate Commerce Committee, it seems to me, is the proper one to have jurisdiction.

It may be that some one will raise the question of constitutional law. The question of constitutional power can be raised on any bill. If that were to control, the Judiciary Committee would absorb the jurisdiction of all our committees. During the last debate regarding rate regulation the question of constitutional power was the one mainly discussed, and yet the bill for rate regulation went to the Interstate Commerce Committee, and not to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. President, these are the considerations which it seems to me require that this bill should be referred to the Interstate Commerce Committee rather than to the Judiciary Committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. CLARK] to refer the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The motion was agreed to.

CIVIL-WAR VETERANS' RETIREMENT.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I have received a large number of petitions and memorials bearing upon the question of the civil-war veterans' retirement bill, pending in the Committee on Military Affairs. There is a great deal of anxiety manifested among those officers, who are now already advanced in years, and I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] if there is any prospect of a report upon that bill, which is now pending before his committee, and, if so, at what time we may expect such report? I do not mean by this inquiry to criticise the Committee on Military Affairs at all, but I am anxious, and I know a number of other Senators are anxious, that this matter may be presented to the Senate for consideration. I shall be obliged to the Senator from Wyoming if he will enlighten us as to the present status of that bill.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, replying to the interrogatory of the Senator from Michigan, I will say there are several bills bearing upon this same subject, but differing in terms; it is not confined to one bill, but there are a half dozen or more of such bills. All have been referred to a subcommittee, consisting of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. WARNER], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. DU PONT], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. DICK], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. FOSTER], and the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. FRAZIER], with instructions by the committee to ascertain as nearly as may be the total yearly cost, the adaptability of the bills to the subject, and object sought, and what shall be the line of beneficiaries included. Those Senators, I assume, are industriously engaged in considering the subject.

I think I ought to say, in addition, that the Senate in its wisdom at the beginning of this Congress initiated a somewhat new feature, or at least created a new committee—a Committee on Public Expenditures—of 21 members. That committee has had meetings, and the chairman has appointed subcommittees, one of which is to examine into and take cognizance of all military matters, which include the army and navy pensions, and so forth. Another subcommittee is to look after new legislation and new authorizations of expenditures.

It is the opinion of the Military Committee, in view of the fact that such a committee has been authorized, and the further fact that the revenues of the Government are not now equal to its expenditures and have not been of late, that when this subcommittee reports the committee will ask the cooperation and assistance of the proper subcommittee of the Committee on Public Expenditures.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, then are we to understand that the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom all these petitions and memorials were referred, are really dependent upon this new committee for action before any progress can be made or these petitions considered?

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, of course I do not propose to enter into the domain or general subject of the powers and the various relations of Senate committees, but my conception of the relations existing between that committee and its subcommittees and the older standing committees is not that of dictation and control so much, but in a matter where the expenditure would reach millions of dollars a standing committee finds that it is necessary to enlist all of the strength that it can; and there being such another committee with such a subcommittee it would be, as the Senator from Michigan knows, very advantageous if the Military Affairs Committee could have the cooperation of so large a committee as the other one mentioned to act in conjunction with it.

I will say there has been no action whatever, so far, which has sought to take from the Committee on Military Affairs its powers in this case or in any other.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, for several years memorials and petitions in favor of this bill have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. They undoubtedly know the general sentiment of the people regarding this legislation. I think it is looked upon with favor in all sections of the country. I was reminded by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. MCENERY] only yesterday that he was very much interested in this legislation and feels it to be just and proper and that it ought to be enacted. I feel the same way about it.

If this new committee, censorizing all that is done by the regular standing committees of the Senate, is to have control of this legislation in any way, then, for one, I propose to reply to all the inquiries that such petitions might with great propriety be addressed to that committee rather than to the Committee on Military Affairs.

These men are advanced in years; they have rendered conspicuous service to the country; and if they are to be recognized at all, it should be done now while they live and can appreciate it. I hope that we may not be delayed much longer; at least we should have a report from the Committee on Military Affairs on this matter for our consideration.

I do not say this by way of criticism of other Senators. I know the sympathy and kindly disposition of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] very well, and that he would not intentionally delay reports that are important or the consideration of bills that are just and right; but representing, as I do, a large number of veterans interested in this legislation, I urge that it may receive consideration and that the Senate may be given opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, are reports of committees still in order?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Reports of committees are still in order.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I trust the Senator from New Jersey will allow me just a moment.

Mr. KEAN. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. I am glad the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] has expressed himself so fully. I think I ought to say, in view of what he has said, first, that a subcommittee which once had charge of this measure felt compelled to report to the full committee against the proposed legislation, thinking it was inadvisable at that time to pass the bills in the form in which they came to us.

I wish to say to the Senator from Michigan that the bills have varied widely in their terms. Personally I have no doubt that at some time some provision will be made for certain or all of the survivors who served in the civil war, but there should be some limit of amount. The bills, in the first place, came in, let me say, to apply only to brigadier-generals and those above that rank, and to give them three-fourths pay of what they would have received if in active service. I assume that the Senator himself would hardly expect the Military Affairs Committee to report in favor of a bill that should pay those who were brigadier-generals and above, when, as a matter of fact, many colonels served for many long months as commanders of brigades who would not receive that compensation. Then, bills followed which applied to those from lieutenant-colonel up; then others covered all of the commissioned volunteer officers. In the meantime——

Mr. FLINT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Wyoming is going on with a long explanation with reference to the amount to be paid these various officers of various ranks, I should like to ask him whether the committee has considered any bill which they could adopt and report to the Senate which would be equitable to all officers?

The Senator from Wyoming also says that the committee can not at this time, but at some other time will, consider the matter. A great many of these officers are dying, and it seems to me that we ought to have prompt action in reference to these various bills.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator from California will content himself until I finish, perhaps he may understand that better.

On the House side a bill was reported which provided for all the officers and the enlisted men—all of rank and file. So there has been such a diversity of opinion as to estimated annual outlay, the amounts running from fifteen to seventy million dollars, that members of the committee have believed that they should take sufficient time to harmonize the opinions and desires of those demanding this legislation. The committee, I believe, will continue its consideration of the matter and take such time as it may find necessary in order to harmonize, if possible, these various opinions which come in here, as I have said before, ranging all the way from those who believe that every man, rank and file, should receive recognition, to those who believe that only certain officers should receive it. Furthermore, there are those who believe the legislation sought should apply only to those above a certain age, and others who believe that it should apply at once and regardless of age.

The Committee on Military Affairs is proceeding in as expeditious a manner as so important a matter ought to be proceeded with. My reference to another committee is not intended to throw the responsibility upon its members. If the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] and others wish to send their resolutions and bills to the Committee on Public Expenditures I shall not contest it. I think perhaps it would be a better plan to do that way. But what I intended to explain was that when we shall have decided, and a bill is reported, if it be a bill which carries millions of dollars, the Senator knows that it will be necessary to have upon this floor and upon the floor in another place very strong efforts and support; I will not say "combinations," but a very strong and large number of men who believe in the measure and who have had time to consider it, or else we never can pass the measure.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I want to disabuse the mind of the Senator from Wyoming that any criticism is intended by me of his committee. I prefer that the Committee on Military Affairs should pass upon these matters, because I feel that they are just and patriotic and will consider these memorials and petitions and act fairly toward these old soldiers.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I only wish to say one word, and that not in the least in any spirit of criticism of the Committee on Military Affairs; but that word is called out by a suggestion of the chairman of the committee [Mr. WARREN] that this matter will be considered in connection with another, and a new committee to determine whether this is the time to consider his legislation.

Mr. President, the legislation should be considered now, as soon as may be. It is a question which enters into human life itself. The men who were fighting for their country and not nesting in comfortable safety are nearing the ends of their lives. It will not be long until no measure, unless it be soon considered, can interest them. They will make their last vivouac soon.

It has been suggested that this committee, which heretofore has handled these matters, is now conferring with another and a new committee, created, no doubt, for a very wise and necessary public purpose; that is, the Committee on Expenditures, which includes in its membership many of the strongest men in this body—a very large committee—and yet our attention was called yesterday to the fact that this new committee, with this important subject of considering the public expenditure, can not itself do that work, and Congress is asked to establish a new agency to do for it the work which it was established to do. That being the case, it would not appear that there would be any overwhelming advantage in having another committee supervise the work of a committee so eminently and so highly experienced as the Committee on Military Affairs, and postpone the consideration of a measure which, as I said in the beginning, involves not only the most sacred sentiments of patriotic men, but the endurance of human life itself, especially as we are confronted with the proposition, which may be right and advisable, though I do not yet know, that within less than a year of the creation of this new committee it itself asks for the creation of a new body to do the very work which it itself was established to perform.

Mr. WARNER subsequently said: Mr. President, I was not present during the discussion with reference to the volunteer retirement bills introduced into the Senate and now before the Committee on Military Affairs. The fact was mentioned that I am a member of the subcommittee to which those bills have been referred. There seemed to be some question whether action would be taken by that committee upon those bills. I am not authorized to speak for the committee, but I do speak for myself as chairman of the subcommittee, and I assure the Senator from Michigan and others that there will not be an hour or a minute of unnecessary delay in presenting a report upon those bills.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate I report favorably Senate resolution 165, which was reported by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] this morning from the Committee on Finance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, reports favorably Senate resolution 165.

Mr. KEAN. Let the resolution be read. I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution. The Secretary will read the resolution for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution (S. Res. 165) by Mr. ELKINS——

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I should like very much if the Senator would consent to take up that resolution to-morrow morning.

Mr. KEAN. Let the resolution first be read. Will the Senator allow it to be read?

Mr. STONE. I have no objection to its being read; but the Senator asked for its present consideration.

Mr. KEAN. I think after the Senator has heard it he will not object. I ask that the resolution be read as amended.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution as amended, if there be no objection.

The SECRETARY. The resolution as proposed to be amended reads as follows:

Senate resolution 165.

Resolved, That there shall be appointed by the President of the Senate a select committee of seven Senators, with authority to sit during the session of the Senate or during the recess of Congress, either as a committee or by a subcommittee, with instructions to make an exhaustive investigation into the cost of living and any increase in the same since 1900; to ascertain whether the price of the necessaries of life which enter into the general use and consumption of the people have, since the year 1900, been increased; and if so, to ascertain the cause or causes which have influenced said increase. In making such investigation special attention shall be given by the committee to the subject of wages, salaries, and earnings, and if the increase in the same has kept pace with the increase in the cost of living; increased price, if any, of such articles as meat, grain, provisions, rents, cotton, wool, clothing, lumber, coal, iron, oil, brick, and cement; stating in said report the price to the producer, the wholesaler or jobber, the retailer, and the consumer at which said articles included in the investigation by said committee were distributed and sold in the year 1900 and the price for their disposition and sale at the present time. It shall further be the duty of said committee to ascertain the cost of production of said articles and the cost of their distribution and sale when in the hands of the wholesaler or jobber and the retailer between the same periods. If, in the judgment of said committee, such articles have been increased in price by reason of the increased production of gold throughout the world and the expansion of the currency in the United States, or by tariff or other legislation of Congress, or by any monopoly, combination, or conspiracy to control, regulate, or restrain interstate or foreign commerce in the supply, distribution, or sale of such articles. And the committee is also authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to make a thorough investigation of the prices of food products on the farm in various parts of the United States, the wholesale prices of such food products at the wholesale trade centers of the United States, and the retail prices of such food products in the larger cities of the United States, and also a comparative statement showing cost of production on the farm.

It shall report the same to the Senate, with suggestions or recommendations as to the remedy to be applied to reduce the cost of living and accompany its report with such recommendations as will, in the opinion of the committee, correct and remove the cause or causes which have enhanced the price of said articles. Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to employ experts, administer oaths, take testimony, send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer to report its hearings, and to have such hearings printed.

And all necessary expenses to carry out the provisions of this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, a number of resolutions covering the subject-matter embraced in this resolution have been pending for some time. This resolution is couched in very different phraseology from that of any of the others, and I should like to have the resolution go over until to-morrow morning, as I think it ought, so that we may have an opportunity to examine it. I shall be perfectly willing to have it disposed of to-morrow morning without any objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri objects to the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to its going over.

Mr. STONE. Let it be printed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I suggest, unless it is already provided by the rules, that the resolution as reported by the committee shall be printed and a copy placed on each Senator's desk.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution will be printed.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. That is provided for now.

Mr. KEAN. It will be printed with the amendments.

Mr. BAILEY. I should myself like to have a copy of it.

Mr. FLINT. I want to suggest to the chairman of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, if he will permit me, that in line 16, on page 1, after the word "wool," the word "hides" be added.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection.

Mr. BAILEY. If you are to add specific articles, then I want leather added, because since you took the duty off of hides leather has gone up.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It was suggested when the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] brought in his resolution, which is one of the many stones that has been the foundation of this composite production, that the price of meat not only here, but the price for American meats and cattle sold abroad, should be included. So I think it very wise that the resolution go over until to-morrow, so that we can see it.

Mr. KEAN. I think if the Senator from Indiana will examine the resolution, he will be entirely satisfied.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I hope I shall be.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I suggest to the Senator from California [Mr. FLINT] that personally I prefer to eliminate all specific articles and make it a general inquiry as to the level of prices. In addition to the suggestion which has been made, of course I am going to insist that the committee shall be directly charged to inquire what influence the enormous increase in the production of gold has exerted over prices.

Mr. ELKINS. That is already in the resolution.

Mr. ALDRICH. Yes; that is in the resolution.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, I only heard the resolution read; I have not seen the text of it; but there is one feature of the proposed investigation to which I want to call particular attention. I think it is a foregone conclusion, which the public has already reached and which a dozen investigating committees sitting throughout the year will not change, that the prices of food products and the prices of commodities in general have gone up and have been going up for a period of ten years. After the committee has made this investigation it will undoubtedly simply reiterate what everybody knows upon that proposition; but the most material point in the investigation, and the one in which there is the deepest and most keen interest everywhere, is whether or not the wages of the wage-earner have increased proportionately.

The report from the Department of Commerce and Labor, which has been laid on the tables of the members of the Senate in response to a resolution which I introduced, shows that the wages in the leading manufacturing concerns of the United States have increased, and the percentage of the increase is given; but all of the investigation of the Department of Commerce and Labor in regard to wages has been confined to the employees in manufacturing establishments. There is a vast army of employees engaged in the transportation business in the United States, there is a vast army of public servants—a very large number of them in the city of Washington—who are living upon fixed incomes, salaries drawn as clerks in the departments, that have not changed a dollar during the period of ten years. There are in addition domestics working in households and employees in the great mercantile establishments; but the inquiry of the Department of Commerce and Labor as to the wage scale has been confined to manufacturing establishments. The proposed investigation, if it is to render a service to the country, should be especially directed to that class of wage-earners not embraced in the investigations made by the Department of Commerce and Labor. The place where the shoe pinches, the place where just ground exists for complaint, is on the part of the wage-earner whose wage has not proportionately increased with the general rise in the level of prices. I call particular attention to that feature of the investigation and express concern as to whether or not the resolution is broad enough to make the investigation exhaustive upon that point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The resolution will lie over.

STATE BANKING STATUTES.

Mr. ALDRICH. From the National Monetary Commission I report a digest of the state banking statutes, compiled by Samuel R. Welldon. I move that the digest be printed. (S. Doc. No. 353.)

The motion was agreed to.

WASHINGTON, SPA SPRINGS AND GRETTA RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. CARTER. From the Committee on the District of Columbia I report favorably, with an amendment, the bill (H. R. 17531) to amend an act authorizing the Washington, Spa Springs and Gretta Railroad Company, of Maryland, to enter the District of Columbia. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendment was, on page 2, line 10, after the words "District of Columbia," to insert "and all obligations imposed on said company by the act amending the same approved March 3, 1909."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

THE FOREST SERVICE.

Mr. HEYBURN. I offer a resolution and ask for its present consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. HEYBURN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the resolution (S. Res. 174).

The Secretary read as follows:

Senate resolution 174.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate a statement as to the amount of money expended under the direction of the Forester in the education of forest students, the institutions they attended, the names of such students, and whether or not their transportation to and from these institutions and their salaries were paid during their attendance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. I note that the Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] is absent from the Chamber for the moment, and I know that he has a resolution on the subject to offer. He has submitted it to me, and the papers are here, I think, containing the information asked for in this resolution, and I do not believe there will be any objection on behalf of the Senate when the Senator from Iowa presents the matter.

Mr. HEYBURN. Let the resolution lie over.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it lie over.

Mr. WARREN. I wish to inquire whether the chairman of the Committee on Printing is aware of the amount of material to be printed?

Mr. DOLLIVER. At the proper time, I will say to the Senator from Wyoming, it is my purpose to submit to the Senate the question of printing this detailed statement of expenditures of the Department of Agriculture which the Secretary, in accordance with the law, has sent to the Senate and which is now before the Committee on Agriculture. I do not intend to conceal from the Senate the fact that it is a large manuscript, and I desire to have the matter referred to the Committee on Printing.

I will say to the Senator from Wyoming that an itemized statement of the expenditures of the Bureau of Forestry is contained in this report, showing the disposition of every dollar of the appropriation.

Mr. SMOOT. The Committee on Printing has decided that the document should not be published in the usual number—2,564—because it would cost some $2,600 to do it. If we have but a hundred copies, they will be sufficient, and that is what will be called for by the resolution to be offered by the Senator from Iowa. If it was published as a public document, it would have to go to every library in the country, to every department in the Government, and the Senate would then receive only 220 copies; and it is believed that this will answer the purpose.

Mr. DOLLIVER. As the matter is now before the Senate I ask unanimous consent, out of order, for the present consideration of a resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to its present consideration?

Mr. GALLINGER and Mr. KEAN. Let it be read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 100 copies of the attached report from the Secretary of Agriculture for the use of the Senate, and that the usual number be not printed.

Mr. CARTER. What is the difference in the cost of printing the usual number and the limited number contemplated by the resolution?

Mr. SMOOT. In my opinion it will be about $500. But that is not all that we want to reach. If this is printed as a public document, it will be sent to every one of the libraries throughout the country.

Mr. CARTER. Most assuredly.

Mr. SMOOT. And that expense attaches to it.

Mr. CARTER. I think that a very appropriate course of conduct in reference to expenditures of the Government. The people are interested in knowing what are the expenditures of the Government, and I can not understand why, when the total expense will only be $2,600 and the expense of printing 100 copies will be $2,100, we should deprive the users of libraries, the usual channels through which this information is disseminated, of the privilege of scrutinizing this report.

Mr. SMOOT. The experience we have had in the past in printing these very documents is that when they go to the libraries they are never placed there for the general public to read. They are thrown aside, and many of the libraries have asked that they be not sent to them; that they take up room.

Mr. CARTER. Would it not be well for the Committee on Printing to prepare a general rule, rather than to select a report here and there to be partially suppressed?

Mr. SMOOT. So far as concerns the suppressing of the report, we have no such idea at all.

Mr. CARTER. I understand; but I do not think the Committee on Printing should pursue a policy which would leave to that committee discretion as to the kind of matter that should go to the libraries and the kind of matter that should be confined exclusively to the use of the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The law requires that every document published as a public document shall go so many to each library in the country, so many to every department of the Government, so many to the use of the House of Representatives, and so many for the use of the Senate. If it is published as a public document we have no control over it; it must be sent to these various places.

The Senator from Iowa, as chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, thought this should be printed for the use of the Senate in the discussion of the agriculture bill, and that was the only reason we had in limiting the number, and for the further reason, of course, of saving that amount of money and that amount of postage.

Mr. BACON. I should like to ask——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. SMOOT. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. If I correctly understand the resolution, it limits the publication to 100 copies.

Mr. SMOOT. One hundred copies for the use of the Senate, and that the usual number be not printed.

Mr. BACON. In other words, it limits it to a publication of 100 copies.

Mr. SMOOT. That is correct.

Mr. BACON. One for each Senator. We will certainly get applications for the document.

Mr. SMOOT. If Senators want the usual number or if the chairman of the committee is desirous that the usual number be printed, so far as I am concerned I shall not object.

Mr. BACON. I am indifferent as to whether it is printed as a document, but the number ought to be sufficiently large to enable those who receive applications for the document to respond to them.

Mr. SMOOT. If the usual number is printed, I will say, there will be 220 copies for the use of the Senate. Of course that will be two for each Senator.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, I had very grave doubts about the wisdom of printing this document at all. It is the same document that is sent under the statutes to all the appropriations committees; and if they were all printed, there would be an enormous bill for printing. I know from a long observation of affairs that few people, if anybody at all, look into such documents. Curiously enough at present the Department of Agriculture and other departments of the Government are exciting some public attention that is not common, and it was the opinion of some very wise men that this year it might be well to depart from the usual negligence with which the Senate treats this document when sent in in typewritten manuscript and to print this report of the Department of Agriculture. I do not believe anybody will ever read it, either here or anywhere else, except possibly a very few people who desire to familiarize themselves with the details of these expenditures, notably the forestry expenses. For that reason I made the suggestion that the printing be limited to 100 copies. If any Senator thinks anyone, either here or anywhere else, wants to read this document, I suggest striking out "one hundred" and the insertion of a provision for printing the usual number, if the Clerk will be kind enough to note the amendment.

Mr. TILLMAN. Can the Senator inform us of the amount of money that will be saved by this departure from the rule?

Mr. SMOOT. About $500, and not only that——

Mr. TILLMAN. We surely are getting very economical if we are going to haggle here about an expenditure like that; quarrel about $500 when we expend and waste, I think, millions on things that are worthless.

Mr. DIXON. I should like to inquire at this time why, especially, the Forest Service is being singled out in detail from all the various items of expenditure? Why is it necessary to spend $2,000 to print the itemized expenditures of the Forestry Bureau as against dozens of other departments of this Government?

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. DIXON. I addressed my inquiry to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I quite sympathize with the curiosity which prompted the Senator from Montana to ask that question; but the truth is that for many years here the appropriations of the Department of Agriculture have been subjected to a running fire of criticism, among which was the fact that the money was being wasted and thrown away and that nobody knew who got it or how much of it. And so strong was the feeling of the Senate in the last session that in the midst of the consideration of the appropriation bill a detailed report was ordered printed of these expenditures.

This proposition includes not only the Bureau of Forestry, but all the bureaus and divisions of the Department of Agriculture, and is simply a statement of the disposition of the funds, the salaries, the lump sums, and whatever is contained in the general appropriation bill. I do not think it is singled out, because that report is sent to every appropriations committee of the Senate under the statute passed some five years ago.

Mr. DIXON. What need is there for reprinting this at the present time, when it has already been printed?

Mr. DOLLIVER. No. The expenditures of the year before were printed last year. This document contains the expenditures of last year and the expenditures of the current year.

Mr. DIXON. What is the purpose of this? Here is the War Department, that spends $100,000,000 of the people's money. It goes into a thousand channels more widely differentiated than this does. Here is the Navy Department, which spends $140,000,000 of the people's money, which goes into battle ships and navy-yards and personnel. So with half a dozen other departments of the Government. For some purpose—and I certainly acquit the Senator from Iowa of having any ulterior motive in the matter—this service is picked out. I just heard read a resolution of the Senator from Idaho directed especially to the expenditures of forest officials, in some schools, as I caught the reading of it. I have seen the statement going around in the press that the forestry officials were spending $40,000 a month to educate their young men at four or five western universities at a total expenditure of $200,000. Why should such loose statements be made on the floor of the Senate and scattered through the newspapers of the country when there is not a word of truth, or only a very little truth, in the whole proposition?

Before I say what I have in mind to say I will state that I made some personal investigations about two weeks ago, when these statements first appeared from inspired sources, from the Capitol. I wrote to the president of a state university regarding this matter, about which these sensational statements have been printed throughout the country. The truth is these foresters during the winter months, when their duties call for little active work as forest rangers, were ordered into these winter schools for a short free course in scientific forestry instruction at the state universities, and there was absolutely not a dollar charged for their tuition. It was intimated that the Government was paying their board and tuition. The truth of the matter is they hold their summer schools of instruction at some convenient point, where they call in their different rangers to educate them along the lines for which we pay them their salaries. These four winter schools were merely calling in the rangers off the snowclad mountains, where they had no duties during the winter months, for a free course of instruction. It is easy to get the facts in the case without spending $2,000 to single out a particular service.

If we are going into these details, let us have the same details with respect to the War Department and the Interior Department. We appropriated millions of dollars last year for the Interior Department for special agents. Let us also have the detailed expenditures of the other departments.

The printing in the proposed report of the different items of expenditures will give every man with an animus an opportunity to pick out and hold up for ridicule these items, with nobody to offer an explanation of what each really was for. Let us have the whole Interior Department expenditures in detail if we are going to have them from the Agricultural Department.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. DIXON. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. The statement of the Senator from Montana is rather interesting to me, and I want to ask the Senator if he ascertained, upon that investigation of his, that, as a matter of fact, students had been attending these universities at the time they were drawing salaries from the United States? I have seen the statement in print.

Mr. DIXON. Four western state universities had established forestry classes—Utah, Washington, I am not certain about Colorado, and Montana. The Forestry Bureau, following a wise plan, as I believe, getting free tuition for their rangers, at no cost to the Federal Government, merely ordered them in for the winter class of instruction, the same as they have done in their summer class of instruction for their rangers and forest supervisors, and ordered them practically into camp at the state universities, where they could receive a free course in forestry, at not one dollar of additional expense to the Govment, except the railroad fare for probably 100 miles and back.

The military department of this Government every year spends thousands of dollars at Fort Leavenworth in educating officers of the army where the Agriculture Department expends money merely for their railroad expenses. We appropriate, I presume, $2,000,000 for the army school at Fort Leavenworth to educate army officers. But in this case where an official of this Government, at no expense to the Federal Government except railroad transportation, seeks to better the personnel of the forest employees by taking advantage of a free course in forestry, certain people hold up their hands in horror at this great extravagance. Is it criminal in the one case and the subject of praise in the other? Why single out one bureau? Let us go into the whole proposition. Let us also have the Interior Department, in all its many ramifications, and the other departments of the Government show their receipted bills and their expenditures in a thousand different directions.

Mr. ALDRICH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. ALDRICH. I should like to ask the Senator whether these students, or whatever they may be called, are a part of the permanent force of the Government, as the soldiers are? Are they employed for life?

Mr. DIXON. They are, under civil-service rules, employed for life.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. That does not employ them for life.

Mr. DIXON. They are under the civil service.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will please be in order.

Mr. BORAH. I am not interested in the criticism of the Forestry Bureau or of the Interior Department, nor do I desire to make any invidious comparisons between any of them, but what I should like to know, since the Senator from Montana has investigated the matter, is whether or not as a fact these students were attending these universities at the time when they were drawing salaries from the United States Government.

Mr. DIXON. They were not attending universities as university students in the usual acceptation of the term. In summer time they are called into camps for courses of instruction, on their own salaries, at the expense of the Government. These were merely winter schools of instruction at state universities, which were giving a free course to anybody applying, without a cent of cost to the United States Government.

Mr. BORAH. Were they on the pay roll and drawing salary at the time they were attending school?

Mr. DIXON. They were, just the same as they were in the summer schools; just the same as an officer of the United States Army at Fort Leavenworth, to take a course in military instruction.

Mr. BORAH. Another question, if the Senator will permit me. How many were attending school under those circumstances?

Mr. DIXON. About 160—about 40 at four different places.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. DIXON. With pleasure.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do I understand that these foresters are under civil-service rules?

Mr. DIXON. They are.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then they must have stood an examination before they were appointed.

Mr. DIXON. I imagine they did.

Mr. TILLMAN. They are very poorly equipped for their work, and very ignorant of the purposes for which they were appointed, or else they did not need to go to school.

Mr. DIXON. Just as a boy sent to West Point is ignorant of the science of war.

Mr. TILLMAN. A boy from West Point, after he is graduated—which would be equivalent to the appointment after examination of a man as forester—does not need to go to school to learn what he is appointed for.

Mr. DIXON. The Senator from South Carolina is probably aware that nearly all of these men in the lower grades of the Forest Service are drawn by civil-service examination from the ordinary walks of life without having had any special course in forestry at any school or university.

Mr. TILLMAN. They have already been sifted out from among others, and they have stood an examination, and they are supposed to know what they are to do.

Mr. DIXON. They have had no training in forestry matters.

Mr. TILLMAN. How can they get an appointment if they have had no training?

Mr. DIXON. Just as with everybody else in the civil service. They pass an examination.

Mr. TILLMAN. Then it is a humbug.

Mr. DIXON. It may be a humbug, but it is not half the humbug that it is to single out this little incident of an opportunity of getting 200 men trained accurately in the scientific end of forestry at no cost to the Federal Government. Why single it out? You vote a hundred millions to the army——

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to single it out. I want to get at the whole thing.

Mr. DIXON. It is not more of a humbug than the money you pay out at Fort Leavenworth every year to instruct men. You appoint every year a hundred second lieutenants in the army from civil life who know absolutely nothing about the business. You send them to Fort Leavenworth. Is that a humbug?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please suspend for a moment. The Chair would like to announce that if any Senator desires to interrupt the Senator who has the floor he should address the Chair and get the permission of the Senator entitled to the floor before he proceeds.

Mr. DIXON. I want to ask the Senator if he thinks it is a humbug to appoint a hundred second lieutenants in the army from civil life and educate them at government expense at $1,500 per annum? Is that a humbug?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized to answer the question.

Mr. TILLMAN. Thank you, sir. I do not know of any appointments from civil life of ignoramuses of that type. They are usually graduates of a military school and are trained specifically along military lines, and they have to pass an examination before they are allowed to enter the army.

Mr. DIXON. Does the Senator from South Carolina——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina yield further to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought he had the floor.

Mr. DIXON. I want to ask him a question in good faith. Has the average second lieutenant appointed to the Marine Corps or the infantry had any military training? Are not three-fourths of them boys who have never more than seen a soldier in uniform before they got into the army?

Mr. TILLMAN. That is not my understanding.

Mr. DIXON. It is mine; and I know of instances of that kind in——

Mr. TILLMAN. It may be the Senator can get appointments of that kind, but they do not come down our way.

Mr. DIXON. At the last meeting of the Military Committee I happened to be present and reported the nominations of four second lieutenants from civil life, one of whom was from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. If so, he had been graduated at a military school.

Mr. BURKETT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. DIXON. Gladly.

Mr. BURKETT. I do not want the Senator to have a wrong impression. It seems that a very proper thing to do here, and almost a mandatory thing, has kicked up a good deal of unnecessary trouble. There has been a law on the statute books since 1895 requiring a department to render to Congress a statement in detail as to where the money has gone that we appropriated last year and also a statement in detail as to where it expects to spend the money that it is asking for the next year.

I sat on the Appropriations Committee in the other House for several years before I came to the Senate, and since I have been here I have had the fortune or otherwise of being on the Appropriation Committee for two or three years. One of the unpleasant things that has always occurred to me has been to bring the great appropriation bills in here covering millions of dollars where not a single person in the Senate was able to stand up and tell the Senate where the money was going to. I say it has been rather trying on me as I have seen the appropriation bills come in. This morning, in a casual sort of discussion, there was one particular point touched of printing, which is referred to here, and it was remarked that it should come here in detail. It seems that when we are going to spend almost $14,000,000 we could well afford to spend a couple of thousand dollars in finding out where the money is going to. I will say to the Senator from Montana and other Senators that I was one of those who thought it was imperatively the duty to print that report, if not for the benefit of the country at large, if not for the benefit of the Senate especially, for the benefit of the committee which was going to pass on the items of the bill. So far as singling out is concerned, it never occurred to my mind that there was any idea of reflecting on anybody or on any particular department.

I did realize, of course, as I realize at present, that this particular department is before the country attracting considerable attention by reason of an investigation, and that very probably before we get through with the hearing of the bill and the reading of all the material that will be required to be printed in some form or other the country will want to know, the Senate will want to know, and above all the committee ought to be forestalled with the most complete possible detail of the information pertaining to the department.

The Senate can readily see that it is impossible to handle a document as it is there in these loose leaves. They are not bound together. There is only one copy of it. It is impossible for even the committee to handle it and get any benefit out of it. So it seemed to the committee that it ought to bring it in here and have it printed and get it in a shape where we may utilize it.

I will say that I am not only making this contention for this particular bill, but, in my judgment, in the consideration of all the great appropriation bills there should be printed a statement, so that Senators can have it before them. When we are spending $100,000,000, as has been suggested, on one bill, we can afford to spend a couple thousand dollars to have the details printed showing where the expenditures go. In my judgment, if we do that we will save enough in one bill by absolutely knowing all the details to pay for all the printing that will be required in connection with all the bills.

Now, that is no reflection upon anybody. I do not think there is anybody here who will not stand up and pay a tribute to the Secretary of Agriculture, and yet I dare say the Secretary of that great department does not know where all the money has been expended that was appropriated a year ago. There is not any of us but who will stand up and pay a tribute to the heads of any of the bureaus under that great department. Perhaps there is not any of them but what I am ready to pay tribute to and to compliment on the great work that they have done, and yet I dare say that the heads of those bureaus do not know where all the money has gone.

Now, if you print these reports and get them in an available shape, the newspapers can publish them, and they will publish them, as a matter of fact, as true, not as hearsay. I think there is now a good deal of confusion caused by the newspapers when they have to get the information the best way they can. It has not been possible for anybody to print the truth about the expenditures of the Agricultural Department or any other department. There is not any way to find out the truth—that is, not any public sort of a way that could be useful; but if you print a document, the truth will go out.

I have such faith in the men who expend this money, I have such faith in every man and every branch and every bureau of the Agricultural Department, that I do not believe it will hurt one of them to have the truth go out. So far as I am concerned, I do not care if it is circulated in every library and circulated all over the country, because I believe when the truth goes out and the people know the facts, they will realize what the Agricultural Department has been doing.

There is criticism, for example, of the Agricultural Department. Perchance I have not heard much of it, but of course there is criticism of that department. This report will show to anyone who wants to know about it, or to anybody who accuses any wrongdoing, exactly what the Agricultural Department is doing. We may be accused, perchance, of being niggardly with the appropriations for the Agricultural Department. We may be accused of being extravagant with the Agricultural Department. The report will show exactly what we are doing, and not only here will we be able to find out what has been done, but all over the country there are people who are interested in certain branches of the work of that department. If the report goes out they will be able to find out exactly what has been done; they will not have to guess at it; and if anything is done that is wrong then they will call some Senator's attention to the particular wrong or the particular extravagance that has been committed, and that Senator will call the attention of Congress to it. So, in my judgment, this report ought to be printed.

I saw here once, in connection with another department, a great appropriation of three or four hundred thousand dollars, and there had never been any sort of report in regard to the expenditure. I never questioned that particular expenditure, but I have always questioned whether it is in the interest of economy, whether it is in the interest of good legislation, that we should appropriate these vast sums of money and never have anywhere printed a report showing how the money was expended.

For example, the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] brought in a bill on Saturday looking to the appointment of a commission to establish business methods—to originate, I guess it would be—business methods for the Government. The Senator knows that I asked some questions about it. I am not responsible for delaying it, but I do hope that the committee reporting the bill will be able to show us what we are going to get by it. I have not much faith in the proposition of commissions. As we have had them in the past, they simply added more expenditure and very little was accomplished. If any good is to be accomplished, I am glad of it, and I hope the committee will be able to show it.

However, one of the troubles that has arisen for that action comes, in my judgment, from the fact that Congress itself has not known enough about the details of what is going on in the Government. I do not mean that every Senator ought to know everything about every question, for that is impossible. I do not expect to know everything about the military expenditures, because I am not on that committee. I am not expected to know everything about the details of the expenditures of the Navy Department, because I am not on that committee. But it does seem to me that those of us, say, who are on the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry ought to know all the details about the expenditures of the Agricultural Department, and those of us who have to handle the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill ought to know all about the details and where the money goes that we appropriate in that bill. Those who are on the Committee on Military Affairs ought to go into the minutest detail so as to know where the money goes that is appropriated in the great military appropriation bill.

As a whole we have to depend in the last analysis upon the committee, upon their judgment and upon their industry in working out these matters. Any Senator can see that without such printing as is here proposed it is impossible for us to go to the bottom of any of these expenditures. It is said that the committees call before them different members of these departments. I wish that some other department was under consideration just now. We call before us the heads of different bureaus. They do not know the details of those expenditures, and Senators who are on the Committee on Appropriations know that often when such persons are called they have to go back and send up a letter in order to give some particular details, or they will have to go back and send up another clerk, a man lower down in rank in the service, who knows more particularly about the details. It is almost impossible even for the heads of the various bureaus to know about the details of the expenditures. The only way that we can get it is in this sort of a report, and the only way that we can make it of any consequence for our use is by getting it in printed form. So I have been in favor of printing the report. I do not know whether it is advisable to print all of these matters. As I said, this was called to my attention, as I am on this particular committee, yet I do not know but that it would be advisable to print in the same way the items regarding every one of the great bills of the departments, though perhaps not every year. Perhaps it would be better to scatter them along, two or three in one year and two or three the next, but I am very certain that this report ought to be printed.

I am very glad the Senator from Montana allowed me to express myself so fully.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I was very glad to listen to the remarks of the Senator from Nebraska, and I fully appreciate most of the things he said. But if we are going to print the expenditures of the Forestry Bureau—and that is what this is for, of course—I want to offer an amendment to have the expenditures of the Interior Department printed in detail, showing what was given to every special agent and how the money we appropriated for that department has been spent. I want that to accompany this same report. The country is up in arms over the Ballinger-Pinchot controversy. If we are going to have the expenditures of one department printed, let us print them both for the benefit of all the people of the United States.

While on this question of printing the expenditures in the Agricultural Department, I should also like to have the Post-Office Department's expenditures printed. My mail is full of letters from people in my State, directly charging that we are paying the railroads of this country 9 cents a pound for carrying second-class matter, while they charge the express companies only a half a cent a pound. I do not believe it, and I can not believe that such conditions exist; but if those things are true, let us have the expenditures, itemized in detail, of the Post-Office Department printed.

I think there is as much agitation in this country now to know where the expenditures in the Post-Office Department go as there is in the little Forestry Bureau, that does not expend one dollar where they expend a thousand in the Post-Office Department. If there is a deficit of $63,000,000 a year in the Post-Office Department from carrying magazines and papers at 1 cent a pound when we are paying the railroads of the country 9 cents a pound for carrying them, let us have that to accompany this report also.

Two or three years ago Congress authorized an Immigration Commission. It is said that they spent $500,000, I apprehend legitimately, and, I think, for a good purpose. If we are going to have the expenses of one department printed, let us have that report accompanied by a report of the expenditures of the Immigration Commission that Congress authorized, which has expended $500,000 of the people's money.

Last year we authorized a currency commission, which, I think, was a most meritorious proposition. How much money have they expended? In what direction has it gone? I should like to see the report of the Monetary Commission printed to accompany these detailed expenditures of the Agricultural Department.

I would not say anything about the contingent expenses of the Senate. Probably that is not a matter of public comment, but it might be well to add the contingent expenses of the Senate to that report, and let us see where that money, too, goes in detail.

Understand me, Mr. President and Senators, I am not objecting to this report. It is all right to have it printed, but I do not want to see flesh made of one department and fowl made of another. Let us have it all if we are going to have any of it. I shall offer at the proper time some amendment to the resolution to get all this information for the benefit of the people and of the Senate.

Mr. DOLLIVER. Mr. President, if I had had the slightest notion that the offering of such a resolution would lead to a prolonged debate I would have hesitated longer than I did in bringing it forward. The presentation of the resolution arose out of the desire of the proper committee of the Senate to have detailed information in respect to the expenditures in the department for which they were charged with a certain responsibility. The law provides that these reports shall be made every year to the Senate in detail. It is not in the nature of an attack on any department that we print their report. On the other hand, it seems rather a shabby method to deal with a report made under the statute by a great executive department that we should not print it. I agree with those who think that all these reports should be printed at least for the use of the two Houses of Congress.

In view of what has been said I desire to withdraw the resolution which I offered——

Mr. BEVERIDGE and others. Oh, no.

Mr. DOLLIVER. And to move that the report be printed.

Mr. MONEY. I hope the Senator will not withdraw the resolution.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I desire to offer the document to be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I wish to be allowed a word on this matter. I am a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. We are just about to begin the consideration of the agricultural appropriation bill, which has come over from the other House. The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. BURKETT] showed very clearly and very forcibly the importance of knowing something about what we are doing in appropriating the people's money.

I concede to the Senator from Montana the correctness of his view, that it is quite important the rangers in the employment of the Forestry Bureau should be well qualified for their work. But I think his parallel with the military department stops short in the desirability of the work, because the education of officers at Leavenworth is provided for by law. He has told us more about the education of the rangers at Harvard or other schools in forestry than I ever heard of before. I presume he is correctly informed about it, and it may be exceedingly desirable, but I want to know the authority of law under which this was done.

The military department of the Government is fully authorized by law in the schools which have been established as to the manner and the time in which the officers shall attend those schools, the code of instruction, and so on. I know of no law which authorizes the Secretary of Agriculture or the Chief Forester to educate his rangers or employees at any university or school, however desirable that work might be. There must be some law authorizing it.

Mr. President, I am especially desirous that this information shall be printed for another reason. I think it is time that the 2,000 or more——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from Mississippi suspend? The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the unfinished business should be laid before the Senate. The Secretary will read the title of the bill, which is the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 5436) to create a legislative council in the district of Alaska, to confer legislative powers thereon, and for other purposes.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside, without prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I am particularly desirous that this detailed report shall be printed for the use of the Senate and for the knowledge of the country. We have been proceeding in a loose way in appropriating money for this department. It is, I think, altogether one of the best-managed departments of the Government, as far as the chief goes; but we have had a Chief Forester, and we have one now, who has over 2,000 men under his employment, without statutory salary or wages. This is absolutely an incorrect way of doing any business for the public.

It is highly desirable, and I think necessary, that this great force of employees should be classified and should have a statutory wage. As it is to-day the caprice of the Chief Forester will determine the pay of all those men. He can raise them up and he can put them down just as he wills.

I have not a word to say against the honorable and distinguished gentleman who has presided over the affairs of this bureau. He is universally highly esteemed; but he is an enthusiast in this matter, and he has gotten it so close to him that he does not see anything else but it, and that is extremely undesirable.

I propose, before the agricultural appropriation bill shall be reported, to make an effort, whether successful or not, to have these employees classified, so that their pay will be determined by law and their duties determined by law, not to be varied by any chief, however good his ideas may be. We are all the creatures of law in the discharge of official duty, and there is no good reason why one man should be exempt in the service of this country.

It is necessary for half a dozen reasons, which it is not necessary for me to state, but I shall certainly make an attempt to do it; and for any chance of success we must have the information upon which we can proceed in this good work.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I have the greatest confidence in the patriotic purposes of the Senator from Mississippi. I fully agree with the statement that he is now making. But is not the Senator from Mississippi just as anxious to know how the other great departments of the Government spend their money in detail as this one bureau? Would it not be a good thing to incorporate in the resolution the further proposition of having all of the departments of the Government submit for printing detailed statements of every dollar they have spent and let us have the information all at one time? What is the objection to that kind of a procedure?

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, there is probably more than one objection to that. The principal objection I have is that we want this printing now for a special purpose. I have no objection to any committee charged with the consideration of a bill appropriating money for any department calling for the printing of any information which it thinks desirable.

I do not know that it would be a good thing to print them all, whether they are desired or not, to lumber up committee rooms or Senators' private rooms with documents that nobody wants and nobody will read. But when a great committee charged with an appropriation bill shows a desire to get the information so it can put it in shape to be made available. I do not see why there should be an objection or why it should depend upon something else being printed which nobody wants. I am somewhat of a utilitarian. I do not want to do things that are unnecessary or superfluous. I can accord to the Senator a desire to know everything about the Government, but what I want to know is about this department, for the proper administration of which I am in some degree responsible as far as appropriations go.

I want to say that there is not a Senator here who feels more liberally inclined to each executive department with which he has to deal than I do. At the same time, however, while believing in liberal appropriations, I believe in economical expenditures. The departments must expect to have their affairs looked into when they call upon us for another appropriation according to their estimates.

Now, in this particular bureau, where over a million dollars has been used as a slush fund, I may say—I will not say for any illegal or corrupt purpose, but because the law has not restricted its use and it can be disposed of at the pleasure of the Chief Forester—have we any auditing officer for this expenditure of over a million dollars? Is there any reviewing officer? He just simply spends the money as he pleases, and this ought not to be.

It grew up from so small a beginning that the danger and difficulty were not obvious at first. It kept growing with the enormous conversion of public lands into forest conservation. We have to-day in the United States of America 303,000 square miles already delimited from the general public domain for forest reservations. It is fifty or sixty million acres more than any empire in Europe except Russia. It is more than the thirteen original colonies leaving out Georgia and South Carolina. We have the information from the Committee on Agriculture—I do not know whether it is correct or not—that after the law approved March 4, 1907, had been signed 15,000,000 more acres, making about twenty-five or twenty-six thousand square miles, were cut out contrary to law. That has to be explained somewhere and at some time.

It is time that we were knowing definitely what we are doing, and it is time that we were determining that no more slush funds in such a vast amount shall be voted to anybody. I would not give the President of the United States, as much as I respect him, the control of such an enormous fund to be used at his will and caprice without an auditing board or a reviewing officer. It is unwise legislation; it is improper administration; it ought to be corrected; and it must begin here, as it has not begun in the other House which originates the appropriation bills.

In view of these things it is extremely desirable that this matter should be printed, and I hope the honorable chairman of the committee will not withdraw the resolution but let it go to an issue now.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I withdrew the resolution simply to make a formal request that it be printed as a Senate document.

Mr. MONEY. Just so that it is printed, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa make that request now?

Mr. DOLLIVER. I make that request now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. President, I want to assure the Senator from Iowa I have no earthly objection to printing the statement. I think it is a wise thing to do; but I think, at the same time, if we are going into the business of printing detailed reports from one department of the Government, showing the expenditure of the public moneys, we certainly ought to include the other departments. What objection is there to it? Will a single Senator who is in favor of this resolution frankly state what objection there is to amending the resolution so as to incorporate all the departments? Let us have them all.

Mr. WARREN. I appreciate what the Senator says about the desirability of printing, but I think it would be entirely out of order to move an amendment to print something that is not before us. This matter now to be printed comes as a report from the Committee on Agriculture. I simply suggest that a request to print various other matters and other reports could hardly be considered as an amendment to a definite proposition from the committee, in the way of a committee report, to print a certain document. At the proper time we can order any other document to be printed.

Mr. DOLLIVER. I withdraw a certain resolution in respect to the printing of the document. I make the request that it be printed as a Senate document without a formal resolution.

Mr. DIXON. I have no objection to the printing of the document. I think I will content myself with offering a resolution to-morrow morning calling for the same kind of information from every other department of the Federal Government.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. DOLLIVER] asks unanimous consent that the itemized statement heretofore presented be printed as a Senate document. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

ACCIDENTS ON THE ISTHMUS OF PANAMA.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 355), which was read, and, with the accompanying paper, referred to the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and ordered to be printed:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I am transmitting herewith certain papers relative to the cases of Alexander Comba, Pedro Sanchez, John H. Cole, and Oscar F. Lackey, who were injured on the Isthmus prior to August 1, 1908, while in the employment of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Comba's legs were crushed, necessitating amputation, and he was still lying in the hospital nearly two years after the accident. The left arm and right hand, except the thumb, of Sanchez were amputated because of injuries received in a dynamite explosion. Cole's right hand was cut off while he was at work on a steam shovel crane. Lackey suffered a fracture of the spine which has permanently disqualified him from doing anything but a limited amount of light work.

In these, and similar cases of injury received by employees of the commission prior to August 1, 1908, there is no authority for giving any pecuniary relief to either the employees themselves or to their families, except that each employee was entitled to and was granted under his contract of employment thirty days meritorious sick leave with pay.

It needs no argument to establish the obligation which the Government of the United States is under to provide relief for its employees who are permanently disabled or maimed, and for the families of those who are thus injured or killed, through no fault of their own, while employed upon work of such hazardous character as that connected with the construction of the Isthmian Canal. This obligation is recognized by the act of May 30, 1908, and by section 8 of the Panama Canal bill (H. R. 12316) now pending before the Congress.

There are a number of bills pending before the Congress for the relief of certain employees who were injured prior to August 1, 1908, and among them a bill for the relief of Lackey. It seems right that some general law should be enacted which will enable a reasonable allowance to be made to employees who were permanently disabled or maimed and to the families of those who were killed in accidents occurring prior to that date through no fault of their own.

By the act approved May 30, 1908, the widow, children, or dependent parents of an employee killed in the course of hazardous employment are entitled to receive compensation for a year at the rate the employee was paid at the time of his death, provided a claim is filed with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor within ninety days from the date of death.

The families of employees living in foreign countries, especially the families of Spanish employees, in a number of cases were unable to file a claim within the limited time fixed. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor has therefore been compelled to disapprove a number of claims which show that the claimants were entitled to the benefits of the act. The time limit for filing such claims should be extended and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor authorized to consider and allow such claims as have heretofore been filed.

I therefore recommend that suitable legislation be enacted authorizing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to act upon any claims for compensation on account of death which have heretofore been filed under the act approved May 30, 1908, and that authority be given the President, under such restrictions as the Congress may deem advisable, to settle all claims on account of the death or permanent disability or maiming of employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission caused by accidents on the Isthmus of Panama prior to August 1, 1908, for which such employees were not responsible.

A draft of a bill, substantially following the Panama Canal bill now pending, which I believe will meet the requirements of the situation has been prepared by the Secretary of War and is at the disposition of Congress.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1910.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GALLINGER. POSTAL SAVINGS DEPOSITORIES.

Mr. CARTER. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the postal savings-depositories bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 5876) to establish postal savings depositories for depositing savings at interest, with the security of the Government for repayment thereof, and for other purposes.

Mr. CARTER. The pending amendment is the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the pending amendment.

The SECRETARY. In section 8, page 6, line 7, after the word "situated," it is proposed to strike out down to and including the word "Territories," in line 11, on the same page, and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses and other charges of the system herein established, and to provide an adequate reserve.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. There is an amendment which is now pending. I desire to move to strike out a part of that amendment, and I inquire what would be the proper form of motion?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas may move an amendment to perfect the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. I wish to strike out the words "and to provide an adequate reserve." I can not see any purpose in that language except to accumulate a fund, which we are trying to avoid.

Mr. CARTER. That is the exact purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. In the consideration of this bill heretofore we have endeavored to throw around it safeguards, so that the money deposited in the post-offices can not be taken out of the community where it was deposited, but that it must be deposited by the Government in the banks of that community. Provision is made by this amendment for the payment of the interest which the Government agrees to pay to the depositor and for the expenses incident to maintaining the system. What necessity, therefore, is there for a reserve?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator, upon close inspection of the amendment, will observe that the reference to a reserve fund, if you please, only fixes the standard for the rate of interest to be charged to the banks. It does not provide for, nor does it contemplate, the withdrawal from the community of any deposit. In recapitulating the basis upon which the board must proceed to ascertain what will be an adequate rate of interest to be charged the banks, several things are to be taken into account. First, the amount of interest to be paid to depositors; second, the amount of the current expenses; and, finally, this amendment provides for the addition of some slight amount to meet the contingency of losses which are likely to occur in the vast operations of this system. It would not answer to charge just the amount of interest the Government would be called upon to disburse under the law plus the salaries of employees and commissions to the fourth-class postmasters. Those two things alone would be comprehended in the word "expenses." It therefore proceeds further and says the board may take into consideration, in fixing the rate of interest to be charged to the banks, the creation of a reserve to meet contingencies and losses which may arise. In the absence of such language, the rate of interest could not be lawfully fixed to meet any losses at all.

Mr. BRISTOW. I would suggest that the word "losses" be incorporated, then, instead of the words "adequate reserve," because "an adequate reserve" is an indefinite term and any construction may be put upon it by the officers charged with the administration of this law, so that the reserve might be adequate for a number of things that are not specified. If the Senator will incorporate the word "losses," it will meet the contingency and relieve the measure from this uncertainty.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator would have the amendment read, then, "a reserve to meet losses?"

Mr. BRISTOW. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. That might be a qualification which the Senator, perchance, would not desire to fix. Experience, as depicted in the course of some observations the other day on the operations of the Bank of England, disclosed the fact that certain profits accrued for a series of years. These profits resulted in the accumulation of a surplus or reserve. Thereupon the price of consols, in which the British funds are invested, increased very rapidly, and such increase resulted in a loss to the fund. The profit on the consols or the interest drawn from that investment not being adequate to meet the expenses and to pay the interest to depositors, instead of reducing the rate to be paid depositors, the Government concluded that it would be better to draw, for the time being, on the reserve fund and maintain the rate paid to the depositors unchanged. That was done for several years. After the lapse of half a dozen years or so the conditions became righted up, so to speak, a profit again accrued, and the reserve fund began to recoup what had been wasted in keeping unchanged the rate of interest paid under somewhat adverse conditions.

Of recent years, however, the reduction in the interest paid on consols has resulted in that country in another loss to the interest fund, but the rate of interest paid depositors still remains unchanged, the reserve fund being drawn upon.

The purpose of the reserve, Mr. President, is to give some stability to the operations of the law. It will not answer to change the interest rate so as to meet a loss here and there over the country. It is better by far to provide what I think would be an adequate reserve, or, in other words, a reasonably safe operating fund, so as to meet any contingent loss either in the operation of the system or the failure of a bank. That is the purpose of the reserve, and that is its only purpose.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, provision for the payment of the interest is already made under the terms of the bill. Under the bill the board of trustees has invested in them an authority to fix a rate that will meet all interest charges, so that the contingency that necessitates a reserve in England can not possibly apply under this bill, because, by the very provisions of the bill, the board is authorized to charge an interest of not less than 2½ per cent, or whatever amount is necessary to meet the interest which the Government is obligated to pay; so that there is no possible necessity for a reserve to meet that expenditure, because it is provided for. Then the expenses are also provided for. It seems to me that the only purpose of the reserve would be to meet losses that might occur, and it would certainly be better to incorporate the word "losses," because then the bill will provide for every form of expenditure that might be incurred.

Mr. CARTER. Well, Mr. President, I do not perceive that adding the word "losses" would be anything short of a limitation. "A reserve to meet losses" would be probably construed as meaning failures of the banks, one or more, in which the funds were deposited, and the amount of funds to be credited for that purpose could not be well ascertained in advance.

Originally the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] had the words "to meet losses" incorporated at the close of his amendment—"an adequate reserve to meet losses"—but at my request the Senator struck out the words "to meet losses," because I could not perceive that they added strength, but were possibly a limitation of the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. But a limitation is exactly what we are undertaking to get. We want it limited.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I should think it would be better not to have a limitation. Unquestionably an adequate reserve fund ought to be provided for any going business to meet any sort of contingency that may arise in the course of its operations.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I should like to inquire if a fund, as provided, paying interest sufficient to pay the expenses of the system and to pay any losses that may occur, does not cover all possible contingencies?

Mr. CARTER. Well, Mr. President, I presume that would be true if the money were loaned out continuously, but there might be contingencies arise that would not come within the strict definition of the term "loss." It might be waste; it might be failure to collect interest.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is provided for in the interest provision.

Mr. CARTER. I do not know whether or not a failure to collect interest would be a loss.

Mr. BURTON. If the Senator from Kansas and the Senator from Montana will excuse me a moment, I should like to make an inquiry.

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. This amendment refers to "an adequate reserve." Suppose there should be a heavy loss from the failure of banks with which the moneys had been deposited. Is there any provision in this bill under which the Government might recoup itself for those losses by increasing the rate of interest?

Mr. CARTER. The purpose of this amendment is to make it quite clear that the Government would have the right to recoup itself on losses by increasing the rate of interest charged the banks.

Mr. BURTON. The term "reserve," however, does not refer to past losses; it refers to provision for future losses or withdrawals by depositors. It clearly does not refer to that which is past and gone.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I should think a reserve could be drawn upon to meet a loss past, present, or to come, whenever it did arise.

Mr. BURTON. Is the Senator from Montana clear that the language used here, "provide an adequate reserve," means payment for losses at all? Does not "a reserve" rather refer to a fund that is ready to meet the claims of depositors?

Mr. CARTER. I think the ordinary purposes to which a reserve is devoted in the course of banking operations would afford the appropriate construction of the word "reserve." A reserve is available, as I understand, in a bank to meet any obligation of the bank. The reserve would be provided in this case to meet abnormal conditions, howsoever they might arise, which abnormal conditions might result in a decrease in the funds of the Government held for the purpose of meeting obligations under the law.

Mr. BRISTOW. There could be no requirement, it seems to me, except for the three purposes mentioned—interest, expenses, and losses. I seriously object to the creation of a reserve, because it enables the board to accumulate a fund as large as it may desire in its discretion or judgment; and the creation of that fund is the withdrawing of that money from the various communities where it is deposited and redepositing it here in Washington or in the commercial centers. That is the serious objection that is urged against the passage of a postal savings-bank bill. We can not be too careful, we can not hedge about this fund, which will grow in time to be an enormous amount, with too many restrictions to prevent such accumulation. I trust that the Senator from Montana will not insist upon the creation of this reserve fund, because it is the vital objection that is offered to the measure by my correspondents; and I have a great many of them.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the original objection was based upon the bill as it was presented by the committee. That bill contemplated the establishment of a reserve fund in the Treasury of not less than 10 per cent. It was suggested that the fund in the Treasury would not draw interest, thus leaving the burden upon the 90 per cent of the deposits to pay the interest on the 100 per cent of total deposits; that this fund, at 2½ per cent, would barely make ends meet, on the interest question alone, with 10 per cent of the money idle in the Treasury. The reserve was, therefore, stricken out, as provided in the bill, and it does not anywhere appear as applicable to deposits.

This amendment relates to the rate of interest to be collected from the banks. It does not change the deposits from the banks to the Treasury; it does not provide anywhere else than the banks for the deposits, but merely fixes a standard which will guide the board of trustees in the determination of the adequate rate of interest which must be charged the banks in order to meet the interest charges of the Government, the expenses of the system, and to create an adequate reserve, leaving the extent of that reserve to the judgment of the board.

Mr. BRISTOW. That is the very point that I am objecting to, that "an adequate reserve is provided for," which is vague and indefinite, for any amount may be decided to be necessary. It would result in increasing the rate charged to the banks for the purpose of accumulating this reserve for an indefinite purpose. It seems to me it is very objectionable.

There will probably be losses—not many, but there may be some losses—and I admit that it is altogether proper to give this board authority to fix a rate that will make ample provision for such anticipated losses. It seems to me that the word "losses" incorporated would remove from the amendment the objection, and I trust that the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], as well as the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], will consent that that word be removed and the word "losses" inserted.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas if he objects to the general principle of a reserve?

Mr. BRISTOW. Well, I object to the provision for a reserve which is so indefinite that it does not specify what the reserve is for. This is not as a bank, because this is not any speculative enterprise. The Government is receiving deposits upon which it agrees to pay 2 per cent interest to the depositor. It is authorized to take that money and deposit it in a bank in the community where the post-office is located, charging not less than 2¼ per cent. The difference between 2 per cent and whatever rate would be fixed is for the purpose of meeting the expenses of the system, paying the losses that might occur and the interest that might not be earned. That covers everything.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment, as Senators will see if they read it carefully, is to limit the amount which may be charged to the different banks for deposits made therein. It says that the rate shall not be less than 2¼ per per cent nor more than sufficient to pay the interest to the depositor, plus the expense of doing the business and plus a reasonable reserve. I see no objection to limiting that reserve. Perhaps the usual reserve on the part of the savings banks of the country is from 5 to 10 per cent. In my State mutual savings banks, where there is no stock paid upon, usually adopt the 10 per cent rate, and after they have accumulated a reserve of 10 per cent they then pay the depositors the actual earnings of the bank.

I see no objection to limiting the amount of that reserve to 10 per cent or not more than 10 per cent, but I can not quite see why it is not best that we charge a rate of interest that will save the Government any loss in doing this business, and it seems to me that "an adequate surplus," perhaps, is as near as we can regulate this matter. In other words, if the surplus was made absolutely at 5 per cent, the rate of interest charged to the banks might have to be the subject of monthly change. I think it should be somewhat elastic.

So far as I personally am concerned, I want to say to the Senator from Kansas now that Vermont is not asking for this bill. We understand that Nebraska, that Kansas, and the Western States are, and because the Republican platform has promised it and because the President asks for it, I, coming from a State that does not care for it—perhaps would prefer not to have it—yield the point and say amen to the proposal for the establishment of postal savings banks. But in the establishment of the banks I think it is the duty of those of us who are not anxious for it to see that a fair and reasonable safeguard is established, to the end that the Government may not be called upon to suffer by reason of this bill. Therefore I provided that the rate of interest charged by the Government to the banks should not be less than 2¼ per cent, or more than enough to cover the expenses; and it seems to me, in doing that, I have met the views of my friends from the West and of the Senator from Kansas. If I am wrong, and if you prefer to have the words "adequate reserve to cover losses," I certainly have not any objection.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should very much prefer to have it specified, because then it does not give any opportunity for the accumulation of 5 or 10 per cent, which, if our deposits aggregate as much as those in Great Britain, would amount to from $40,000,000 to $70,000,000, to be accumulated by the imposition of interest on this fund, which I think would be very unfortunate.

Mr. PAGE. I do not care to take that matter out of the hands of the friends of the measure or the Senator who is in charge of it, but with his permission I should not have the slightest objection to restoring those words.

Mr. CARTER. I shall interpose no objection, if it is acceptable to the Senator from Vermont, to the amendment being changed in that way—"to meet losses."

The SECRETARY. After the word "reserve," it is proposed to insert "to meet losses."

Mr. GALLINGER. "And other contingencies," I should think.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, it occurs to me that it ought to be broadened a little. It seems to me if we are going to insert those words, we ought to insert the words "to meet other contingencies." I do not think it should be so circumscribed. There may be other things that would come under that head which should be included.

Mr. PAGE. What can the Senator conceive of which would not come under those three provisions?

Mr. GALLINGER. I have an impression there might be other things. It will do no harm to insert the words.

Mr. President, I think we ought to establish a reserve just as other financial institutions do, and name the amount. I have in my hand a report on a bill that I have submitted to Congress several times during the last few years, for the reimbursement of the depositors of the late Freedmen's Savings Bank, which was a governmental institution, established by the Government, officered by the Government, administered by the Government of the United States. Under the operations of that law the poor colored people of the country deposited nearly $3,000,000. The bank failed What has been the result? We have paid back of that amount $1,730,000. There is now a million dollars due those depositors, and yet we are haggling in Congress here over the repayment of that amount. There is no reserve from which to pay them. The Government is morally bound to reimburse them, and yet the Government does not reimburse them.

Mr. President, it seems to me if we are going into this matter of asking the poor people, largely aliens, to deposit their funds in this bank, we ought to provide a reserve, which all prudent institutions in this country do, so that in the event of losses occurring, defalcations occurring, misappropriations of funds occurring, and the banks failing, we would be prepared to reimburse the depositors promptly and to the full amount of their claims.

I will not press the suggestion I made a moment ago to add the words "and other contingencies," but I will say that I hope the Senator from Vermont will see the propriety of specifying, say, 10 per cent—which is what the savings banks of New Hampshire provide—to secure the depositors in those banks and make it definite. "An adequate reserve" does not mean anything. It is as elastic as a piece of india rubber. It may be one-half or one-fourth of 1 per cent, or 1 per cent, or 5 per cent, according to the fancy of the board having this matter in charge. If we go into this business at all—my State is not asking for it; I do not know whether I shall vote for this bill or not—I want to see these poor people so taken care of that after their money shall have been deposited in the banks they will not sustain any losses through failure or through misappropriation of funds.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have a very poor comprehension of this bill if under any possible contingency the poor depositors to whom the Senator from New Hampshire refers could suffer. I am, in this amendment of mine, trying to provide for the poor Government. I do not want it to suffer. This simply provides that we shall accumulate a surplus which shall protect the Government. If I thought that any words could be added which would strengthen this idea of a surplus, I certainly should not object to their insertion, although I do not believe in 10 per cent or more than 10 per cent; I do not think it should exceed that in any case, and my impression is there never will be a time when there will be a 5 per cent deficiency.

Mr. GALLINGER. If the Senator will permit me, I may have an entire misconception of the purpose of the bill. I have sometimes thought that nobody quite understands it. I fear that is the case. But is the Senator sure that the poor depositors could not suffer in any contingency? Is the Senator sure there will be a profit in this transaction? There is not going to be any profit to the Government in all the fourth-class postoffices. The profits will have to come through the larger postoffices of the country. Does the Senator know how many thousands of employees it will require to conduct this business? Has he the least idea?

Mr. PAGE. That may be a point for future discussion; but to come to the point which the Senator has raised, I understand that the position of the Government is that of a debtor to the depositors.

Mr. GALLINGER. Precisely; and I agree with the Senator in that I likewise want to protect the Government as well as the depositor. But I want to protect the depositor not at the expense of the Government, and it seems to me we ought to have a provision here that would absolutely protect both the depositors and the Government. It may be it is in the bill. I am not going to be technical about it. But it occurs to me that we yet have to give this bill very serious consideration before we will have it in shape where it will not leave the depositors in precisely the position the depositors in the old Freedmen's Savings Bank are—where the Government admits there is a million dollars owed to those poor colored people, through the failure of a bank established by the Government, officered by the Government, administered by the Government, and yet we are not paying it to them.

Mr. PAGE. To be entirely certain about this, I want to read my amendment again and see if it does not cover the exact point to which the Senator from New Hampshire refers:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses, and other charges of the system herein established, and to provide an adequate reserve.

If that does not meet all the contingencies suggested by the Senator from New Hampshire, I will be very glad indeed to have him suggest some language that does, and I shall be only too glad to incorporate it in the amendment.

Mr. GALLINGER. Mr. President, I am willing to bow to the superior judgment of the Senator from Vermont, who knows very much more about banking than I do. My only anxiety is to have the Government and the poor people who deposit in those banks dealt with fairly and honestly. If the Senator is sure that his amendment covers those contingencies, I have nothing further to say. I was afraid it did not.

Mr. PAGE. That was certainly the design of the amendment, and I think it does, although I do not claim to have any judgment superior to that of the Senator from New Hampshire in regard to the matter.

Mr. BRISTOW. I understand the Senator from Montana and the Senator from Vermont offer no objection to the amendment I made, to add the words "to meet losses."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to insert at the end of the proposed amendment the words:

To meet losses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to be heard on the amendment.

Mr. President, it is an absurdity to suppose that the banking business can be carried on without a reserve. All States, in governing the business of banking, some by severe penal laws, require a reserve fund, and I think we can hardly recommend to the country a bill here which entirely omits so necessary a provision.

I desire to vote for this bill, but I doubt whether I can do so, provided section 8 is retained. It provides that the Government shall go into the banking business on a very large scale. If there can be found anywhere in the country a banking institution which has succeeded when doing business in such a manner I should like to know where it is.

What does this bill provide? That money shall be received on deposit in 46 States and the Territories of the Union, and that when so received it shall immediately be redeposited in banks in the towns in which it is received from the depositors. If there is more than one bank, it is to be divided among them, if you can.

At the very start it is expected there will be 7,000 towns or cities in which these funds will be received and located in the banks—7,000 cities, with all their varied interests, remote from any center, to be looked after by a department which is not in the banking business, but which is organized for the purpose of conducting the postal affairs of the Government.

To conduct a banking business is no child's play. It requires men of the very best training. It requires constant watchfulness in looking after each debtor and in considering the conditions of the money market. Why is it safe for an ordinary bank to extend credit to a minor institution in the country or near at hand? It is because it is constantly having transactions with that institution, knows of its promptness in making remittances, knows the degree of risk it incurs in extending credit. All those sources of knowledge, all the precautions which an ordinary bank would take, would be entirely lacking in the conduct of affairs as contemplated in this measure. This provides for embarking in banking enterprises on an enormous scale, over a great area, giving the direction of the business to men who are not trained bankers and whose other duties occupy all their time.

Let us look for a minute at the manner in which this money is to be secured:

The board of trustees shall take from such bank or banks such indemnity bonds as the board may prescribe, approve, and deem sufficient and necessary to insure the safety and prompt repayment of such deposits on demand.

That is a novel method, Mr. President, for securing the payment of money to depositors. Ordinarily it is rather a slow and tedious procedure to secure money on an indemnity bond. If there were any system of private banking under which the funds of an institution were to be let out on indemnity bonds, I am inclined to think depositors and those who had to deal with it would be very suspicious of it.

Or, it is said:

At its option any bank may deposit collateral security.

Think for a minute what kind of banking management it would be for a central department here at Washington to receive, as security for money lent, collateral given in a remote part of Arizona or Washington. A bank in Alaska even might take advantage of this privilege. What degree of judgment could be exercised in regard to such collateral? What assurance would there be that it would be adequate security?

And yet under the terms of this section a bank in any portion of the United States or its Territories has the option either to give an indemnity bond to pay for good money deposited with it or to deposit collateral security.

The fact is there is illustrated in this bill what often happens in legislation—that when a salutary policy or enterprise designed to benefit the people is presented, local or selfish interests seize upon it for their own benefit and nullify all the good that would come from it.

I do not believe, Mr. President, in the idea of sending this money all over this country and investing it with these various banks. It is demanded by local interests, but it is contrary to every principle of good financial policy and fatal to success.

We must bear in mind at the very outset that we are differently placed from the other countries in which there are postal savings banks. In these practically every one of the deposits made at the post-office is utilized for the payment of the public debt. The depositor in the savings bank is a creditor of the Government; and incidentally it may be remarked that the postal savings-bank system in England and France strengthens not only the credit of the Goverment, but the Government itself, because every small proprietor who leaves his modest sum at the savings bank has an interest both in the finances of the Government and in the continuance of its authority. How is it possible to make those institutions in countries much more paternal than ours successful? It is the fact that there is an easy means of disposing of the moneys deposited. Buying government bonds or utilizing it in some other way to carry a share of their great indebtedness.

This bill has a distinctive feature, at least as contemplated under section 8. It is unique, but it is a feature which I do not believe is practicable, namely, the provision that money when once deposited shall be reinvested. The postal savings bank of England is an agency for the United Kingdom for carrying a part of its national debt. This proposed savings bank is going into the banking business, pure and simple. The Government receives deposits. For what? Not to pay the expenses of the Government, not to carry a part of its debt, but to reinvest again.

Right in this connection I wish to call the attention of the Senate to one fact. I think you may search this bill from beginning to end for any provision which secures the depositor in case the money deposited in these numerous banks should not be forthcoming. Is there any appropriation of any money to pay losses? Is there even a declaration in this whole bill that the United States of America is responsible for any failure to pay? Instead of that there are long and complicated provisions relating to the manner in which the money shall be received and shall be invested.

Everyone would draw the inference from reading the bill that the Government of the United States was a mere trustee, receiving money from the depositor, scattering it among some 10,000 banks, collecting it back from those banks, and paying it to the depositors when they request it, but in case the banks fail, making no provision to reimburse the depositor for his loss.

I am perfectly aware, Mr. President, of the degree of confidence with which propositions relating to banking are usually approached. I claim no experience in the business, and yet certain principles pertain to it which every student of the subject must observe. It is not an easy matter to receive funds and then invest them and be assured of their safety. It is an oversanguine temperament which trusts that every man who borrows money will repay it, and repay it promptly. And so this business must be managed with extreme care, with the greatest strictness in requiring security for the repayment of indebtedness.

Another thing, and it applies with especial force here: It must be conducted within such limits that it may be safely managed, and in this bill I am satisfied no such limits exist. Where else is there a bank, where else a financial institution, which has been established or which if established has survived, which has pretended to do business with ten thousand and more correspondents, when there must be absolute ignorance as to the financial condition of nearly all of them?

It is plain to see what the object of this bill was—to give to different localities loanable funds; and perhaps for a commendable reason—that the rate of interest might be lower in such portions of the country as furnish deposits. But, Mr. President, that is more or less of a delusion. Money will go from these outlying towns, however remote they may be, to the financial centers. You can not prevent it. There will be times in the year when there will be a surplus of money in the possession of the country banks. A bank can not, as this bill seems to contemplate, lend all its funds in its own immediate locality. It sends them to some city where the money is required.

Thus there is a transfer from the country to the city. In certain seasons of the year it is bound to accumulate in these financial centers, and no statute law that we can pass will prevent the operation of that inexorable financial law. You might just as well attempt to frame a measure under which the wholesale or jobbing trade should be transferred from the cities to the little towns. What is the explanation of the origin of several great banks in London? They were first established in the country. They gained very large deposits in the manufacturing and agricultural centers, but they found it was necessary to send the money for investment to London. At first they changed their business only so far as to establish an agency in London, but later they moved their main office from the country into London, maintaining their branches outside and obtaining from them deposits, but depending upon the financial center as their place for lending most of their funds.

I want to say that this bill, I think, is framed upon an entirely wrong theory when it overlooks that fact—that just as the great currents of business in merchandise seek their center in the larger cities, so the deposits of banks will inevitably go to the same place. There is, of course, at times a movement in the contrary direction, but the advantage of the great financial centers is in the constant demand for money which exists there.

Mr. President, I question very much whether such a plan is either safe or workable. These deposits are to be scattered more than to the four winds, in every direction in our country, in all kinds of institutions, without the ability to properly judge of their stability. It is certain that under such an arrangement as this an ordinary bank would fail.

There may be a very considerable depletion of the funds that are deposited. If there were some method by which this money could be used for the purpose of paying off our national debt or for the purchase of our bonds, or if it could be put under the charge of a central agency which could invest these funds in such a way as to make them promptly available to pay debts, we would have a very different proposition from what is here.

Right in this connection I wish to call attention to some doubtful points in the bill. Are deposits in a certain town to be paid by the postmaster by checks on the banks in that town, or are they to be paid from some center? Are there notices to be given of the time after which amounts can be withdrawn?

Suppose a bank in which deposits are made fails to respond. What is to be done? I do not believe it needs any law or statement of fact or experience to make clear to the Senate that you can not depend upon all of the 10,000 or more banks to respond promptly to the demands upon them. It would be absolutely unprecedented in the history of banking. In this bill, without reserving the right to supervise, we say that every bank in the United States is a safe depository for the funds of poor people, those of limited means, who choose to depend upon savings banks created by us. It is virtually a statement that we will rely on all the various banks to meet whatever demands are made upon them at any time.

I started, Mr. President, to oppose the omission of reserves, and I will return to that for a minute. It seems to me it would be most careless on our part to omit a provision for a suitable reserve fund, not merely a reserve against losses, but a reserve that will meet demands made on the banks. A reserve does not necessarily imply the permanent loss of the funds deposited, but in all banking business there are times when there is a failure immediately to respond to current demands in particular localities, and I feel that we shall be derelict to our trust if we do not insist upon the maintenance of an adequate reserve fund. To limit the bill to a reserve for losses is to violate every principle of good banking and every rule of prudence in the management of funds.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

Mr. BURTON. On that I ask for a division.

Mr. KEAN. Let the amendment to the amendment be stated.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will again read the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. At the end of the proposed amendment insert the words "to meet losses," so as to make the amendment read:

At a rate of interest not less than 2½ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses and other charges of the system herein established, and to provide an adequate reserve to meet losses.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 3, noes 41; no quorum voting.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Crawford	Gallinger	Nixon
Bourne	Cullom	Gamble	Oliver
Brandegee	Curtis	Gordon	Page
Briggs	Depew	Guggenheim	Richardson
Bristow	Dick	Heyburn	Root
Brown	Dixon	Hughes	Shively
Burkett	Dolliver	Johnston	Simmons
Burnham	du Pont	Jones	Smith, Mich.
Burton	Elkins	Kean	Smoot
Carter	Fletcher	La Follette	Stephenson
Clapp	Flint	McCumber	Warren
Clarke, Ark.	Foster	McEnery
Clay	Frye	Money

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum of the Senate is present. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Before the question is put, I should like to say a few words for the benefit of Senators who were not here. First, I will ask that the amendment of the amendment to the amendment be read.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the amendment and the amendment to the amendment will be again read.

The Secretary read the amendment and the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, the interest that is to be charged the banks upon this fund is for three purposes—to pay the interest that the Government owes to the depositor, to meet the expenses of the system, and to create a reserve to meet losses. The amendment of the Senator from Vermont proposes to provide "an adequate reserve," leaving the reserve vague and indefinite as to what the reserve would be. The objection I had to that was that the reserve might be used to accumulate a fund in the Treasury for which there would be no definite use, and that it would drain the money from distant parts of the country and bring it here to Washington and accumulate a fund that could be used at the discretion of this board, which, I think, is undesirable.

The reserve can be used for no other purpose except to meet losses, because there is no occasion for a reserve for any other purpose. The interest that the Government owes is provided for, the expense of the system is provided for, and a reserve is being provided for to meet the losses that might occur in the handling of the money. I do not believe that we want a reserve for any other purpose. Certainly, we do not want a reserve to loan out. We then would be going into the banking business, as suggested by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

It is the purpose of my amendment to limit the amount of money that will be collected in the reserve to the amount that is necessary to meet the requirements of the system, and not permit the accumulation of a fund that is not needed for those purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I desire to restate very briefly, in answer to the Senator from Kansas, what I have already said, that no banking business, no business which involves the payment of deposits, is safe or prudent without a reserve fund. There is no provision in the bill anywhere for the payment of losses by the Government, and as this means embarking in the banking business on a very large scale, I maintain that provision should be made for an adequate reserve in accordance with the phraseology of the amendment as it would be without adding the words "to meet losses."

Mr. FLINT. May I ask the Senator from Ohio a question?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. FLINT. Do I understand that the Senator desires to have a rate of interest charged that would be sufficient to create a large sum of money as a reserve, and that it should be maintained in the Treasury of the United States as a reserve at all times, the same as the capital of a bank?

Mr. BURTON. If I would answer the question of the Senator from California by yes or no, I should say "yes." I will say, however, that I have mentioned no particular percentage or sum. What is needed is a sufficient reserve to meet emergencies. Without such a fund, either by direct appropriation by Congress or by the retaining of a certain portion of the interest, it would leave this system in an unworkable condition and in an unsafe one as well.

I think the objections of the Senator from Kansas, that we can not tell how this fund would be used, are not well founded. It would be very easy to pass a statute providing what disposition should be made of it.

Mr. HEYBURN. I should like to ask the Senator from Ohio a question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. Why is any reserve necessary when the entire fund of the deposits is subject to the Government's check to meet these very demands?

Mr. BURTON. Because everyone familiar with the banking business or the deposit of money knows that losses occur here and there; also that there is delay in payment where actual loss is not involved.

Mr. HEYBURN. But the entire sum deposited, whatever it may be, under the provisions of the bill is subject to the Government's check to pay any obligation that may rest upon the Government, whether it be deposits, losses, or whatsoever. Why create a reserve fund under those circumstances, when every dollar is subject to the Government's check?

Mr. BURTON. It certainly will be a revelation to the financial world to learn that it is safe to conduct business where the amount of deposits is no less than the amount of obligations, particularly when they are scattered in 10,000 different banks. That is, you do not have a dollar in excess of obligations which you may or may not obtain promptly, and portions of which you are reasonably certain to lose.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is there any part of this sum of, we will say for convenience, $700,000,000, that is not at any moment subject to the check of the Government upon it?

Mr. BURTON. The Senator from Idaho seems to overlook the fact that banks occasionally fail, and there have been instances in which banks have been tardy in meeting the demands upon them, even though they do not fail.

Mr. HEYBURN. But, Mr. President, does the Senator lose sight of the fact that the Government's check may be made upon any bank in the United States, and not upon any particular bank, and is he to presume that all the banks will fail and be unable to meet the Government's check?

Mr. BURTON. I suppose demands can be made upon any of them, but the plain intent of the proposed law is that the money shall be repaid from banks located in the same towns in which the deposits are made.

Mr. HEYBURN. But not necessarily under the provisions of the bill. The bill makes it a common fund deposited in a large number of banks against any one of which the Government may draw. Suppose the local bank does fail, under the provisions of the bill the Government may draw upon any other bank, because it is all one fund, so far as the Government is concerned.

Mr. BURTON. It would certainly be a most irregular proceeding to draw upon one State, where large demands may be made in the future, to pay for deficiencies already incurred in another State. It is contrary to the whole spirit of the system as proposed here.

Mr. HEYBURN. Is it to be presumed that all the banks in any one State in the Union are going to fail? If that idea enters into the consideration of this question, it is on even more dangerous ground than we had ever thought it might be.

Mr. BURTON. I think the Senator from Idaho will recognize the fact that there have been times when there has been a partial suspension over wide areas of the country, perhaps over the whole country, which would be so serious that money could not be promptly obtained. I think, also, the Senator from Idaho will, if he considers the question, recognize that many banking enterprises are started with high hopes and with great pretensions, which fail simply because of the same sanguine reliance on prompt payment which seems to be manifested here to-day.

Mr. HEYBURN. No word has been uttered during the discussion of this matter that more clearly emphasizes and points out the dangers of this system.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I listened with interest to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. He remarked that we—that is, the Government of the United States—are about to engage in the banking business, that we are about to engage in it on a large scale, and it would be contrary to the best business methods pursued by other people engaged in the banking business not to have a reserve fund. I should like to ask that Senator, waiving all questions of the constitutionality of this proposed act, whether he thinks it an expedient and wise thing for the Government, which is organized only to govern, not to go into business of any sort, to begin business and to begin what he has called a "banking business on a large scale?" Does the Senator think it is wise and expedient to support such a measure?

Mr. BURTON. O Mr. President, the question is somewhat embarrassing to me——

Mr. MONEY. I withdraw it, Mr. President.

Mr. BURTON. But the question is whether I can vote for the bill with section 8 in it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE].

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, there being on a division—ayes 4, noes 44.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE]. [Putting the question.] The noes appear to have it.

Mr. CARTER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to have that part of the bill read and then to have the amendment read, so as to show the difference between the bill as it is unamended and as proposed to be amended by the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Secretary will read as requested by the Senator from Kansas.

The SECRETARY. The first part of section 8, as proposed to be amended by the committee, reads:

That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks, whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination, and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, nor more than is reasonably sufficient to meet the expenses and interest charges of the system herein established, and which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories.

If amended as now proposed the first part of section 8 will read:

SEC. 8. That postal savings funds received under the provisions of this act shall be deposited in any solvent bank or banks, whether organized under national or state law, being subject to national or state supervision and examination, and doing business in the city, town, or village in which the post-office is situated, at a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses and other charges of the system herein established, and to provide an adequate reserve.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, as I understand it, the only change the amendment of the Senator from Vermont makes is to add the reserve feature. The bill provides for an interest that will meet the expenses of the system, and the Senator from Vermont seeks to amend it so as to provide for a reserve. I should like to know what occasion there is for a reserve. The reserve that is secured by charging interest to the banks is for the purpose of meeting expenses that are contingent to the system. Then it is proposed to create a reserve for some vague and indefinite purpose—to meet losses or for any other purpose that the board may decide. It has been suggested that the reserve should not be less than 5 and possibly as much as 10 per cent of the deposits. If 10 per cent, and there was as much on deposit in the United States as there is now in England, it would mean a fund of $70,000,000 lodged in the hands of this board, to be invested by them at their discretion; and that is the very thing we have been seeking to meet since the bill was introduced.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator from Kansas pardon an interruption?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. That difference, if made 10 per cent—I do not know of any authority for its reinvestment—if it is to be held as a reserve to meet losses, unless it be reinvested, the total loss of interest on 10 per cent would approximately equal the difference between the rate of interest the Government pays and what it receives.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. CARTER. I think the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] did not desire to convey to the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] the impression that this amendment provided for any 10 per cent reserve, nor for any reserve in the Treasury of the United States at all.

Mr. President, the issue here presented is very simple. The rate of interest to be paid depositors by the United States is 2 per cent. The rate of interest to be paid by the banks to the United States will not be less than 2¼ per cent, plus any amount in excess of that sum which the trustees may deem necessary to meet expenses, to pay the interest to depositors, and, according to this amendment, create an adequate reserve. An adequate reserve for what?

Mr. President, we will assume that the amount on deposit is $100,000,000. The United States is absolutely obligated to make up the $100,000,000 and pay the same on demand. There is no question about that. In order to meet the contingencies which are likely to arise, and which will surely arise in some cases, it is important, it seems to me, that a small surplus be provided to protect the Government against a deficiency which will arise between the amount of money paid back by the banks and the amount the Government is obligated to pay to the depositors at the post-office plus the expenses. This proposed reserve is not intended to set aside any part of the deposits in the Treasury of the United States; it does not refer to an amount received at a post-office, but it constitutes an element in the computation of the interest to be charged to the banks. So those Senators who oppose the amendment must do so upon the theory that they would leave the Government absolutely unprotected by making any provision at all for any failure of any bank or any contingency which might arise in the conduct of its business.

I would go further, Mr. President, than an adequate reserve. I would, if I had the sole say, provide that the trustees might create a surplus to demonstrate the earning capacity of these deposits to the end that we might in due time increase the 2 per cent interest to be paid to depositors. If the money of the depositors under the administration of the Government can be made to yield an amount which will enable the Government to pay the depositors more than 2 per cent, a fair regard for the depositor requires that the money be made to earn that which it will legitimately earn in the market.

I have no tender solicitude for the banks. I anticipate that they will get this money just as cheaply as they can and loan it out at as high a rate as they can get. This surplus is to be made to pay the interest, the earnings of the deposits. It is to remain, of course, in the banks, to be added to the funds. If it amounts to a million dollars in a year, it will leave the Government in funds $1,000,000 in excess of its outstanding obligations to the depositors—nothing less and nothing more. If the Government loses a million dollars during a year, it will have a million dollars less. If there is no reserve fund provided, there will be a million dollars short, and that million dollars must be made up by being appropriated out of the Treasury of the United States. I would that this money, when loaned to these banks, should be loaned at a rate of interest which would create a surplus to meet all the contingencies that might in reason be expected to arise. The term "adequate" will appeal to the sound judgment of this board of trustees. The failure to provide any reserve, but only for expenses and interest, will invite an obligation upon this Government to make direct appropriations to meet any losses that may be incurred in the course of the administration.

I believe the amendment will avoid that contingency by authorizing the creation of a surplus to meet contingencies that may arise and will probably arise. Senators who feel that they can just as well bring about a situation which will lead to an appropriation to meet deficiencies in the administration of this service may, of course, dispense with any surplus or any reserve. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I should like to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] whether there is a sufficient limitation in the amendment "and other charges of the system?" Of course that is a very indefinite term.

Mr. CARTER. I will ask that the amendment be again stated, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I am reading from the amendment. It says:

> At a rate of interest not less than 2¼ per cent per annum, which rate shall be uniform throughout the several States and Territories, nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to depositors, the expenses and other charges of the system herein established.

Now, I want to ask the Senator——

Mr. CARTER. Has the Senator from Michigan read all the amendment?

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. The amendment concludes:

> And to provide an adequate reserve.

I should like to ask the Senator from Montana if it is not possible that the "additional charges" may be so large that the money can not be turned over to the banks at such a rate of interest as they would be willing to pay, in which event the funds would be disposed of in the discretion of this board of trustees—a situation which I seek to avoid. The words "and other charges of the system" should be defined by contemporaneous construction.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I have no doubt that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] was very solicitous that under no combination of circumstances should the Government be left to make up a deficiency to be provided for by appropriation from general funds of the Treasury to meet the expense or anything connected with this operation. The word "charges" may be, as added to "expenses," surplusage. I think it was interjected by the Senator from Vermont through an abundance of caution. After all, the only purpose of the amendment is to guard the Government of the United States against loss by providing that the board shall charge the banks an adequate rate of interest to meet the government charges and expenses, and likewise to provide an adequate reserve.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW] will pardon me——

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. I think the solicitude manifested by the committee is very creditable. The Government ought not to take any chances, and it should have funds from which it could recoup any necessary charges for the administration of this law. I agree perfectly in that. Under no circumstances, however, do I want any power given to this political board of trustees which will enable them to so burden this fund that the banks may not want it, and then have it to dispose of in their discretion. I should regard that as a calamity, to leave the disposition of this fund to any board, and I hope that the amendment is sufficiently safeguarded, so that there can be no stretch of construction placed upon the word "charges" that will operate to defeat our purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wish to ask the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] another question. As I understand from his statement and from the bill the Government is to pay 2 per cent interest?

Mr. CARTER. Not less than that.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not less than that, or such sum as will pay the running expenses of operating this system. In addition to that, if I correctly understand this amendment, it attempts to create a surplus in addition to the necessary running expenses. I can not understand any necessity for a surplus, other than that in a case where a bank might possibly fail or where the board itself loses money and fails to get a return upon it. If the Senator would just simply add after the word "charges" the words "including any probable loss," we should then have entirely disposed of the surplus question and we should have a levy which is sufficient to cover all running expenses, including the probable losses, and no more. It would seem to me that that would be a far better amendment than the one which is now suggested—to consider the matter of the losses practically as a part of your expenses.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. HEYBURN. According to the provisions of this bill there will be no surplus accumulated from the difference between the interest paid by the Government and the interest received by it, because the bill provides in terms that that amount shall be added to the salaries of fourth-class postmasters. Forty-four thousand postmasters are to receive one-fourth of 1 per cent, in addition to their present salaries, for handling this business. The difference is between what the Government pays and what it receives—one-fourth of 1 per cent. Where is the surplus? Out of what margin is the surplus going to accumulate? That is the question. You have already disposed of the profit which the Government is supposed to make under this bill by donating it to the postmasters for their services; and if you do not charge more than 2¼ per cent there will be no surplus arising from the interest earned by this money, except 6,400 postmasters, whose salaries are not to be increased, which is only a very small proportion of them, That disposes of your accumulation of a surplus out of the interest.

Mr. CARTER. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, the point made by the Senator from Idaho leaves out of consideration a very important element which most people understand in connection with the calculation of interest. I have paid enough interest to know something about it. The fact is, that the postmasters are paid not to exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent on the money on which interest is paid at their respective offices. The Senator must remember two things in that connection, both of them worthy of reflection: First, postmasters get not to exceed one-quarter of 1 per cent on the amount of money upon which the interest is paid at the office over which they preside——

Mr. HEYBURN. That is not the provisioh of the bill.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator will find it in the bill.

The amount of money, on the average, on which interest will be paid at a particular office will fall far short of the amount annually received at that office, because the interest is to be computed annually, whereas withdrawals during the year will average, perchance, about as much as the amount of money on which interest is paid.

Mr. HEYBURN. That it not the provision of the bill. If the Senator from Kansas will permit me, the postmaster, if I am not mistaken in my recollection of the provisions of the bill, is to receive one-quarter of 1 per cent on the money he takes in, whether it is loaned or not. If the money is never loaned to the banks and earns nothing, still you pay the postmaster one-quarter of 1 per cent upon the money which he takes in. That is my recollection of the bill, and I think the Senator from Montana will find that it is correct. If that money never earns a dollar, then the Government would have to pay that money out of the principal.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, this is the provision to which the Senator refers, and I will read it for his information. Section 10 provides:

> That additional compensation shall be allowed postmasters at post-offices of the fourth class for the transaction of postal savings depository business. Such compensation shall be at not to exceed one-fourth of 1 per cent on the average sum upon which interest is paid each calendar year on receipts at such post-office, and shall be paid from the postal revenues.

Mr. HEYBURN. That is, on which interest is paid to the depositor in each calendar year, and not interest paid by the banks.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I labored in vain if I did not make that quite explicit. I intended to have the Senator understand that the compensation of the postmaster was to be computed on the basis of the interest paid on deposits received at his office.

Mr. HEYBURN. Paid by whom?

Mr. CARTER. Paid by the United States, of course.

Mr. HEYBURN. Yes; then the interest is to be paid by the United States on all of it; so that there is no contingency about it. The Government pays interest whether it loses the money or not.

Mr. CARTER. The Senator, in order to get that correct, must refer to that portion of the bill which provides for the computation of interest, the computation being annually only.

Mr. HEYBURN. It does not make any difference whether it is annually or monthly.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE] be amended by striking out, in line 5, the words "and other charges of the system herein established" and inserting after the word "the," in line 4, where it occurs the second time, the words "actual expenses of administration," so as to read:

> Nor more than is sufficient to meet the interest paid to the depositors and the actual expenses of administration.

Mr. BRISTOW. I should like to observe now, if other Senators are through——

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas let me ask the Senator from Montana a question?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. CLAY. I have gone through this bill very carefully. I went through it last night, and if there is any satisfactory way for the depositor to withdraw the money that he has deposited, I have not been able to find it. Suppose a depositor living near a fourth-class post-office in the country deposits $25 with the postmaster. That money is afterwards loaned to the bank. The depositor is known to nobody except the postmaster. He simply has had the transaction with that postmaster, and the postmaster has not charge of the funds any longer.

Suppose the depositor wants to draw $10 of his deposit at some time in the future under the provisions of this bill, where will he get it? On whom will he check? He can not check on the bank, because the Government is dealing with the bank and making loans to the bank, and the depositor is dealing with the postmaster. The postmaster undoubtedly will not pay him the $10 on his demand. He can not draw a check on the bank for the amount, because he has no relations whatever with the bank. In reading the bill and analyzing it I have not been able to reach the conclusion that there is any satisfactory provision specified therein whereby the numerous depositors throughout the length and breadth of the country can draw their funds. To say the least, many of the depositors, if not most of them, will be plain people, poor people, who know very little about the banking business, and so there ought to be specified in this bill a plain provision as to how they can get their funds.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. I should like to make a brief statement in reply to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. CLAY].

Mr. BRISTOW. Certainly.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the details connected with withdrawals have not been provided in the bill, and for reasons that I think will appear quite obvious to the Senator on very brief explanation. It is provided in section 7:

> That any depositor may withdraw the whole or any part of the funds deposited to his or her credit, with the accrued interest, after complying with such regulations as the board of trustees may prescribe.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to prescribing rules, permit me to say to the Senator from Georgia that experience here and elsewhere, as time goes by, will enable the board of trustees to accommodate the depositors of the banks or the post-offices infinitely better than any foresight we can display with reference to the details with which we are little acquainted. For instance, I have here a circular entitled "Post-Office Notice; Advantages of the Post-Office Savings Banks." It was published many years ago and was sent me through the mail by an individual who had been a depositor for many years in the postal savings banks of the United Kingdom. With reference to withdrawals, let me say to the Senator that the whole matter is left to rules and regulations, and in the course of time they have added many things to the method of withdrawal which have convenienced the people. For instance, the circular goes on to say:

> Withdrawals can be made with the utmost promptitude by sending notice by post to the London chief office on the form provided for the purpose, which is obtainable at any post-office, and payment can be received at any savings-bank office in the United Kingdom convenient to the depositor, without regard to the office of deposit.
> Withdrawals by telegraph: On application at any savings-bank office, which is also a telegraph office, and on procuring the deposit book, a depositor may, at a small charge, obtain payment on the day of notice of any sum up to £10, or payment can be received by return post of any sum up to £20.

They have the postal telegraph connected with their post-office system in that country. Just how far the board may be able to go for the convenience of depositors time and experience will determine. That the convenience of the public will be consulted in the administration, with due regard, of course, to safety in the checking of accounts, is not a matter, I think, open to much question.

Mr. CLAY. By all means, I will say to the Senator, this bill ought to provide, or the rules and regulations ought to provide, if you are going to leave it to rules and regulations fixed by the board of trustees, that the small depositors can draw their money out of the post-office where they deposit it or out of a bank close thereby.

My recollection is that the bill originally reported from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, which was before the Senate probably two sessions ago, provided how this money should be withdrawn. That, in connection with the safe-keeping of these funds, is the most important matter that we could possibly consider, affecting, as it does, the convenience of the depositors. If the depositor were to go anywhere else than the place where the deposit was made, in nine cases out of ten he would have to be identified, which might give him a great deal of trouble. There is nothing that the Senator has said which shows that there is in this bill anything that aids the depositor in any way in checking on the funds he has on deposit.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the Senator will remember, I think, that the bill formerly introduced provided that an application should be made by the depositor at the post-office, that application to be forwarded to the Postmaster-General. We anticipate that the forwarding of applications for repayment to the Postmaster-General may be avoided. Payments can not be made at the respective post-offices without some examination of accounts. We can not make every postmaster to whom this bill applies a banker for the community. We can not cause the postmasters to keep open accounts subject to check. We do not intend by the bill—at least I do not so understand the purpose—to engage in the current business of banking. The purpose is to enable the people to save small sums, and not to open bank accounts upon which they can check for current needs.

Mr. CLAY. But, with the Senator's permission, the Senator recognizes that the small depositor who places his money with the Government, by all means and at all times ought to have the right, when he needs it, to draw it out, and there ought to be every possible convenience for the depositor to draw his money out. I will say to the Senator that when this bill was originally reported to the Senate I was on the subcommittee that considered it. The Senator knows that I voted for a favorable report on that bill—and I do not say that I shall vote against this bill—but I do say that I have not been as much impressed during the last ten or fifteen days with the bill now pending as I was with the bill formerly reported.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, the bill as formerly reported undertook to prescribe the details of administration. This bill eliminates them and leaves them to rules and regulations to be prescribed by a board of trustees. The bill as originally introduced left the entire administration to the Postmaster-General. This bill contemplates the administration by a board. The bills are somewhat different in the respects to which I have referred, but in no other essential respect.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I will not consent that a vote be taken on this amendment without a quorum of the Senate being present.

Mr. CARTER. Will the Senator allow us to proceed to the consideration of executive business? The hour is getting somewhat late——

Mr. BRISTOW. I yield for that purpose.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. CARTER. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session, the doors were reopened, and (at 4 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, February 9, 1910, at 12 o'clock meridian.

CORRECTION.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Speaker, I ask to correct the RECORD and the Journal. The RECORD indicates that I reported from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization the bill (H. R. 20166) to amend section 21 of an act entitled "An act to regulate the immigration of aliens in the United States," approved February 20, 1904, relative to criminal aliens. The bill is a committee bill, and was ordered reported by Mr. HOWELL of New Jersey, the chairman, and so reported. I think it is due the desk to say that the fault is very largely mine. I do not think the exact facts were indicated on the report.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, not only the RECORD but the Journal will be corrected.

The Journal was then approved.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union; Mr. TILSON in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 19255, the diplomatic appropriation bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BARTHOLDT].

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, at the proper time I propose to offer the following amendment to the pending bill:

For the maintenance of international headquarters of the Interparliamentary Union, $5,000.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment is subject to a point of order for the reason that such an appropriation is not authorized by existing law, but I trust that the point may not be made owing to the beneficent object to be attained by the amendment.

When in 1908, during the session of the interparliamentary conference at Berlin, the news came that the British Government had decided to make an annual appropriation of £2,000 for the support of the Interparliamentary Union, there was general rejoicing among the 700 lawmakers who attended that conference as the representatives of twenty or more parliaments of the world. While it was known that Norway, Denmark, Switzerland, and some other smaller countries had for some time past been making appropriations for that purpose, Great Britain was the first of the greater countries to offer such a contribution. Since the Berlin conference the question has been taken up in nearly all national legislative bodies represented in the Interparliamentary Union, and the probability now is that when that organization of lawmakers will meet at Brussels this year favorable reports will be received from the majority of nations, and it is my fervent wish, shared, I hope, by every Member of the American Congress, that the United States may be among them. It was upon the motion of your humble servant that in 1906 the London conference unanimously agreed to appeal to the governments for financial aid in furtherance of the great work of the Interparliamentary Union; hence, unless the American Congress proposes to repudiate the action of its own delegates, a compliance with that resolution can not well be refused; in fact, the United States should be the first country to extend its helping hand.

It is proper to ask what these amounts of money are to be expended for, and I hope the House will bear with me while I make a brief explanation. The Interparliamentary Union, from the time of its foundation in 1887, has maintained permanent headquarters at Berne, Switzerland, with a general secretary and several clerks in charge. These officers rendered their services gratuitously, while the necessary expenses were defrayed by small contributions from the several branches or groups and from individual members of the organization. As the membership of the union grew, and its importance as a factor tending to international amity and peace was more and more recognized, it became desirable to reorganize the union and to enlarge its administrative functions. Therefore at the Berlin conference it was decided to appoint a salaried permanent secretary and to transfer the headquarters from Berne to Brussels, with a view to eventually locate them in the peace palace at The Hague, which is being erected through the generosity of an American citizen. The administration of the union is in the hands of an executive board composed of prominent members of the union, under whose auspices the secretary and clerks perform their work. This work consists in conducting a voluminous correspondence, in preparations for the annual or biennial conferences, and in recording the events in the cabinets as well as parliaments such as may be of interest to the members of the union and having reference to the peace of the world. The object of my amendment, therefore, is to officially grant financial support for the maintenance of that international bureau instead of further relying on voluntary contributions by groups or individuals.

It is apparent that the significance of the appropriation here asked for does not lie in the amount of money to be contributed, but in the official recognition of the Interparliamentary Union by the governments of the world. Morally it has been recognized long ago. To its influence was due the convening of the first and second peace conferences at The Hague, the first one having been called by the Czar after that monarch had been familiarized with the aims and objects of that organization, and the second by President Roosevelt in direct response to a resolution of the interparliamentary conference held in St. Louis in 1904. For both of The Hague conferences the union had prepared a fixed programme, and the influence of its members was exerted at The Hague in 1899 as well as in 1907 in the direction of making the governments adhere to the programme arranged by the representatives of the legislative bodies of the world. At the conferences to be held between now and 1915, when the third great council of nations will meet at The Hague, additional demands to insure the more permanent peace of the world will be formulated, and thus the task of the governments will be considerably lightened by the preparatory work of the union, whose voice may well be recognized as the voice of the people. The limited time allotted to me will not permit of a more comprehensive review of the history of the Interparliamentary Union, but allow me to suggest that the growing sentiment of the people of all countries in favor of substituting judicial decisions for brute force in the settlement of international controversies is due more to the systematic efforts of that organization and its members than to any other one factor, especially because all these members have mandates as lawmakers in national legislative bodies and are therefore clothed with responsibility by the people.

The membership of the union is now over 2,000, and I am happy to say that over 200 members of our own Congress have signified their willingness to participate in the great work of the union and to subscribe to its beneficent objects. It has been proposed to clothe the conferences of the union and the organization itself with an official character by providing for the formal election of the delegates to its conferences by the respective parliaments, but, to my mind, it is a question of grave doubt whether the usefulness of the organization would thereby be enhanced. Certainly its liberty of action would thereby be limited, and its cherished independence partly destroyed, but there certainly is no reason why the governments should not contribute their mites toward the maintenance of the organization, voluntary though it may be, and to the perpetuation of its great work in behalf of international arbitration and peace.

It is well to remember in this connection that other governments are going much further in their promotion, by financial means, of international amity and peace. Only recently the Government of Great Britain has set aside a fund of $250,000 to be expended for the entertainment of distinguished visitors from other countries and for the encouragement of mutual visits. It is evident that no moneys could be expended for a nobler and more beneficial purpose. There is nothing more apt to bring nations closer together than an increased mutual understanding of each other. The conferences of the Interparliamentary Union serve such a purpose, inasmuch as they are held in the great capitals of the world and are bringing together from seven to eight hundred lawmakers, representing practically all the parliaments of the world. I well remember what a wonderful revelation to the more than 200 members of foreign parliaments was their visit to the United States on the occasion of the great interparliamentary conference held at St. Louis in 1904. They came as skeptics and parted as our friends. Most of them were born and reared in monarchical countries, and they did not believe until they saw it with their own eyes what a successful experiment a democratic government has proved to be on American soil.

The effect and benefit of that visit, short though it was, will be perpetual and will remain an asset of the American people for all time to come. Its value can certainly not be measured by dollars and cents, and therefore when a small appropriation is asked for a cause of this character there should be no dissenting voice.

The only question is whether the aims and objects of the Interparliamentary Union, for which this support is asked, are worthy of our approbation. On this score permit me to say that only members of national legislative bodies are eligible to membership in the organization; hence it is made up not of dreamers and visionaries, but of practical men of affairs, who, being elected by the people, are responsible to the people. It is plain that this element of responsibility must always be a safeguard against the schemes and dreams of visionaries. The whole platform of the union is contained in the first section of its constitution, which says that—

> The Interparliamentary Union consists of members of all parliaments, who have organized groups in their respective countries for the purpose of carrying out, either by legislation or international agreement, the principle that differences between the various nations shall be settled by arbitration.

If there is a Member of this body or an American citizen who is not willing to stand upon this platform, I have not heard of him, and my proposition is that, as we have ascertained the right, the time has come to enforce the right and to carry out that platform by practical measures.

While I have the floor, Mr. Chairman, I should like to call the attention of the House to the progress already made toward the peaceful settlement of international disputes by the substitution of judicial decisions for war. As will be remembered, the second Hague conference, while assenting to the creation of a permanent court of arbitral justice, had failed to agree on a method of appointing the permanent judges. At the same time, the governments had unanimously agreed on an international prize court. While the powers had promised to give their immediate further attention to the appointment of the permanent judges, nothing was done by them for several years, and it seemed as if a deadlock had been reached. Then it was that Secretary Knox, with the advice and consent of President Taft, sent his circular note to the powers proposing that the contemplated prize court should be invested with jurisdiction as a court of arbitral justice, and that the same judges should sit as members of both courts. It was an inspiration, and the plan appeared so eminently practical that its approval by the powers is now only a question of time. It will mark the actual establishment of a supreme court of the world, and therefore the realization of Secretary Knox's plan must justly be recognized as a new and distinct triumph of American statesmanship, an achievement which will redound to the everlasting credit of the present administration and to the glory of this Republic. [Loud applause.]

With the permission of the House, I shall insert an interesting article on the history of The Hague court:

THE PROPOSED HIGH COURT OF NATIONS.

[By James L. Tryon, assistant secretary of the American Peace Society. From the Yale Law Journal for January, 1910, with permission.]

"Very recently the State Department has proposed in a circular note to the powers that the prize court should also be invested with the jurisdiction and functions of a court of arbitral justice. The United States, as the originator of this project, is confidently yet anxiously looking forward to its acceptance by the powers, which will give to the world an international judicial body to adjudge cases arising in peace as well as controversies incident to war." (Secretary Knox.)

An international court was one of the first ideas proposed in the practical programme of the world peace movement. As early as 1840 the constitution and functions of such an institution were worked out by William Ladd, the founder of the American Peace Society. This legal preventive of war was afterwards urged by the Peace Society, and in later years was predicted by Edward Everett Hale as sure to be realized. But not till the first Hague conference met in 1899 did an international arbitration court come into existence. The "Permanent court of arbitration," as it is technically called, though popularly known as "The Hague court," settled the Pious Fund case, the Venezuela Preferential Payment case, the Japanese House-Tax case, and the dispute between Great Britain and France over their treaty rights in Muscat, passed upon the Casablanca incident, adjusted the dispute between Norway and Sweden as to their maritime frontier, and has pending before in the fisheries dispute between the United States and Great Britain and the Orinoco Steamship case between the United States and Venezuela.

That the court has been a success, on the whole, is beyond question. The only serious fault found with its decisions has been in connection with the Venezuela Preferential Payment case. In that case the court was accused of favoring the side of military force, which it was established to supersede; but its decision was accepted as law and was approved by such high legal authorities as Chief Justice Baldwin, of Connecticut, and Prof. John Bassett Moore, of Columbia. (See Mohonk Report for 1904.) Other criticisms, however, have been made in regard to its constitution and the liberty of its members. These will be dealt with later. The fact that nearly a hundred arbitration treaties, including 24 made by the United States, pledge most of the nations to refer certain classes of disputes to it, shows that it has won public confidence, and has, to a large degree, become fixed in the life of the world. But besides this court, which is actually in service, are two others, both of them projected by the second Hague conference, that may also go into operation when certain formalities are complied with or certain necessities arise. One of these is the international prize court, which is for the adjudication of cases of capture of neutral merchant ships and cargoes in time of war, a code for which was made at the naval conference held in London in 1909, but is not yet ratified by the nations that are parties to it. The other is the court of arbitral justice, also called the "Judicial arbitration court," which is for the same kind of cases that now go to the permanent court of arbitration. It is the court of arbitral justice, an institution that is known to but comparatively few American people, and that may easily be confused in the popular mind with the present Hague court, to which I wish to call attention.

But why, it may be asked, should we have a new court when we already have one that is successful and acceptable? The answer reveals the wonderfully rapid growth of the peace cause within the past decade, and is of special interest to lawyers, because it is they who, coming to the aid of the movement, are responsible for the proposition. Improvements upon the procedure of the court of 1899 were suggested by various writers, but except for the American Journal of International Law, practically no peace literature up to the time of the second Hague conference proposed a new court, nor had any demand been made for it, either by peace societies or by the resolutions of the Interparliamentary Union, which are frequently taken as the platform of the peace movement.

The progress which has been made toward the court is due primarily to the efforts of three great American lawyers—Ex-Secretary ROOT, Prof James Brown Scott, and Hon. Joseph H. Choate, especially the two first named. All who attended the opening session of the National Peace Congress in New York in 1907, which was organized for the purpose of bringing public sentiment to bear on The Hague conference, will remember the profound impression made by Mr. ROOT's address. In it occurred these significant passages, which may be taken as the foundation ideas of the proposed court:

"In the general field of arbitration we are surely justified in hoping for a substantial advance, both as to scope and effectiveness. It has seemed to me that the great obstacle to the universal adoption of arbitration is not the unwillingness of civilized nations to submit their demands to the decision of an impartial tribunal; it is rather an apprehension that the tribunal selected will not be impartial."

Mr. ROOT quoted in support of his position a dispatch that Lord Salisbury sent to Sir Julian Pauncefote March 5, 1896, in which the difficulty of selecting impartial judges from a panel of arbitrators, on account of popular sympathy for one side or the other, is pointed out.

"The feeling which Lord Salisbury so well expressed is, I think," said Mr. ROOT, "the great stumbling block in the way of arbitration. The essential fact which supports that feeling is that arbitrators too often act diplomatically rather than judicially; they consider themselves as belonging to diplomacy rather than to jurisprudence; they measure their responsibility and their duty by the traditions, the sentiments, and the sense of honorable obligation which have grown up in centuries of diplomatic intercourse rather than by the traditions, the sentiments, and the sense of honorable obligation which characterize the judicial departments of civilized nations. Instead of the sense of responsibility for impartial judgment which weighs upon the judicial officers of every civilized country and is enforced by the honor and self-respect of every upright judge, an international arbitration is often regarded as an occasion for diplomatic adjustment. Granting that the diplomats who are engaged in an arbitration have the purest motives; that they act in accordance with the policy they deem to be best for the nations concerned in the controversy; assuming that they thrust aside entirely in their consideration any interests which their own countries may have in the controversy, or in securing the favor or averting the displeasure of the parties before them, nevertheless it remains that in such an arbitration the litigant nations find that questions of policy and not simple questions of fact and law are submitted to alien determination, and an appreciable part of that sovereignty, which it is the function of every nation to exercise for itself in determining its own policy, is transferred to the arbitrators."

Mr. ROOT illustrates his view by reference to the satisfactory settlement by arbitration of disputes among South American States, the arbitrators of which were detached from international politics and confined themselves to the merits of the questions before them, "as a trained and upright judge decides a case submitted to his court."

"What we need for the further development of arbitration," added Mr. ROOT, "is the substitution of judicial action for diplomatic action, the substitution of judicial sense of responsibility for diplomatic sense of responsibility. We need for arbitration not distinguished public men concerned in all the international questions of the day, but judges who will be interested only in the question appearing upon the record before them. Plainly this end is to be attained by the establishment of a court of permanent judges, who will have no other occupation and no other interest but the exercise of the judicial faculty under the sanction of that high sense of responsibility which has made the courts of justice in the civilized nations of the world the exponents of all that is best and noblest in modern civilization."

Mr. ROOT was at this time Secretary of State and in a position to give his ideas effect. He therefore embodied them in his instructions to our delegates to the second Hague conference. His outline, which was calculated to put arbitration upon a judicial instead of a diplomatic basis, was elaborated by Prof. James Brown Scott, solicitor for the Department of State, and technical delegate to The Hague. Professor Scott, whose name will always be associated with historic attempts to make a high court of nations, gave his whole soul to the proposed court at the time and has done his utmost ever since to have it made a living agency of justice. His plan was brought before the conference by Mr. Choate, who assisted him enthusiastically. It had the joint sponsorship of the United States, England, and Germany. No less strenuous a personage than Baron Marschall von Bieberstein, Germany's first delegate, expressed the belief that such a court would automatically attract to itself the disputes of nations for settlement.

The agreement providing for the court contains 35 articles. The first article reads as follows:

"With a view to promoting the cause of arbitration, the contracting powers agree to constitute, without altering the status of the permanent court of arbitration, a judicial arbitration court of free and easy access, composed of judges representing the various judicial systems of the world and capable of insuring continuity in jurisprudence of arbitration."

The main features of the proposed court correspond with Mr. ROOT's idea of a court of law. They may be best appreciated in a comparison with the so-called "Permanent court of arbitration." First of all, the proposed institution is a court, and not a panel. The number of its judges, though not given in the agreement, is expected to be 15, with deputies as alternates. Fifteen members would mean nearly twice as large a body as the Supreme Court of the United States, which consists of nine judges, but is small compared with the number allowed to the court of 1899, which may consist of four arbitrators from every one of the 46 States that are commonly recognized as belonging to the family of nations, though two or more States may choose the same judges, and may therefore go outside their own nationality for their appointees.

Many smaller powers have appointed only one or two judges of this court. But the arrangement as already carried out means about 100 judges, and might mean nearly 200, or so large a body as could never conveniently come together; or which, if it did, would be a judicial assembly rather than a court, which is undesirable. On the other hand, 15 judges make a body that is not unwieldy, but sufficiently large to guarantee impartiality, which is better secured, especially in important cases, by having a moderately large rather than a small tribunal, say, of three or five members.

Next there is the essential characteristic of permanence. The court of 1899 is styled "permanent," but, as Professor Scott has pointed out, this is a misnomer. The panel is permanent, but the tribunal is only temporary, as it is selected for every new case. In spite of the efforts of the United States to make it permanent, the court of 1899 was never intended by the powers to be so. Andrew D. White, delegate to the first Hague conference, said in an address at Mohonk:

"First, it has been argued that The Hague Tribunal should sit steadily and permanently, thus resembling the Supreme Court of the United States. This idea was embodied in the first American proposal made in 1899, but an almost unanimous opinion was soon developed against it.

"It was objected with much force that the expense of maintaining such a court in permanent session would be irksome to all the powers, and that upon some of them it would bear somewhat heavily. It was also urged that such a court in continuous solemn session, having, certainly during intervals of many months, and perhaps even during years, nothing to do, would probably become an object of ridicule, and that finally, even among the greater powers, a sentiment would probably arise which would give opportunity for demagogues to move to strike out the appropriations for the maintenance of a court apparently accomplishing nothing. These considerations prevailed and the tribunal was established as we now have it. It is my belief that any effort to change the present system during the session of 1907 will be met by the same arguments which were urged in 1899, and with the same result."

Furthermore, the members of the court of 1899 are appointed for a term of but six years, though their appointment is renewable. The judges of the proposed court would have a term of twelve years, which is also renewable. The judges of the court of 1899 are paid only when they are on duty, which is when they have a case to try. The judges of the proposed court would be put on a salary of $2,400 a year from the time of their appointment, and receive about $40 a day, with traveling expenses additional, when they go into session. The draft of the agreement contemplates an annual session beginning the third Wednesday in June, provided public business requires it; besides the election annually of three of the members, with substitutes, as a permanent delegation in residence at The Hague and always ready to try minor cases or cases for summary procedure. The delegation is a unique and promising feature of the proposed court. It makes the court free and easy of access, which is desirable, and is an advantage over the system of the court of 1899, whose tribunals have to be especially summoned, even for a minor case. It is given large power, but can not perpetuate itself at the expense of the whole court, as it is not only subject to election by the general body, but may at any time, on application of the nations, be superseded by it. The whole court may at any time be summoned in extraordinary session by the delegation. The delegation may act as a commission of inquiry, and, as such, may have associated with it nationals of the states parties to a case who, though not members of the court itself, may assist in its investigations. This arrangement therefore supplies machinery for a permanent commission of inquiry, such as might take a case like the Dogger Bank incident, with the assistance of naval experts, or any case in which facts are in dispute, and report on its findings. The world has never yet had a permanent commission like this. Provision for it is potentially a great peace measure.

One of the advantages in permanence is continuity of jurisprudence. It is believed that the system of long tenures of office and the provision for a delegation always on duty would tend to the creation of precedents that would insure continuity of jurisprudence, which is one of the chief purposes of the court. Later its decisions might furnish material for a code of international law, an ideal that in the last generation was held up before the nations by David Dudley Field, and has since been supported by the Interparliamentary Union.

The criticism made by Mr. ROOT that arbitral procedure has been diplomatic rather than judicial is met by the requirements for the fitness of the arbitrators. Both the court of 1899 and the court proposed in 1907 contemplate the selection of members of high moral character and recognized competency in international law, but the plan for the new court, unlike that of the institution of 1899, insists that they shall have qualifications as judges according to the standards of their own country or have a reputation as jurists. Here is a safeguard against the choice of mere politicians or diplomatists to adjudicate matters in which compromise, negotiation, and compliance with excited public sentiment are out of place, but in which only the application of the law to the merits of the case is in order, which was Mr. ROOT's idea, as expressed in his New York speech. The court, as already indicated in the first article [see ante], also contemplates the use of the prevailing systems of jurisprudence—Roman, Spanish, and Anglo-American—which its practice is expected to harmonize.

The proposed judicial arbitration court, to be sure, if installed today, would not be open to all the nations, as is the present Hague court, but only to the nations which accept it by entering into a special contract. These nations, however, acting as a whole and not separately, are to pay the salaries of the judges, a method that is an improvement on the court of 1899, as under its system each litigant pays its own judges, a thing that would not be tolerated in a judicial court in municipal law. The costs of the proposed court, apart from the salaries of the officers, are apportioned among the litigants, who are also required to pay their own charges for counsel, witnesses, etc. No judge will be allowed to sit on a case in the decision of which he has already taken part in its earlier stages in national courts, nor can he appear before the court as counsel or advocate in any case, as men have done before the court of 1899. A judge is not permitted to receive money or hold any office under authority of one of the litigants, or of his own nation, inconsistent with his duties as a judge. In these respects, then, the new court is more truly judicial than the court of 1899, and, though limited to the contracting powers, is fundamentally more international in its spirit.

Such are some of the superior features of the proposed court of arbitral justice. It is not, however, intended to supplant the court of 1899, but to be used instead of it if litigants prefer its services. It is stipulated that its members shall be taken, as far as possible, from the judges of the permanent court of arbitration. In common with that court it follows the procedure laid down in the Convention for the Pacific Settlement of International Disputes, except as it is empowered specifically to make its own rules. Its jurisdiction is as large as possible. It may take cases coming to it by a standing treaty of arbitration or by a special agreement. The United States and Germany suggested that it might also be used as a court of revision or review, but their suggestion was rejected. As already pointed out, members of it may act as a commission of inquiry. They may also serve in the International Prize Court. With such large and varied possibilities, the court of arbitral justice ought, when established, to attract nearly all controversies between the nations.

The projected court has the further advantage of being allowed to formulate the preliminary conditions of an intended arbitration, which is known as the "compromis," unless that be specifically excluded from its power, or is otherwise provided for by treaty. This formulation may be made at the request of one of the parties when diplomacy has failed and the other party is reluctant to arbitrate. The power to make it corresponds somewhat to the forcible citation to court of one party by another in municipal law. This provision does not apply to the twenty-four treaties made between the United States and other powers, as the preliminary agreement under them must, in every case, be made by the President and the Senate. It is, however, especially applicable to disputes relating to contract debts, an agreement to arbitrate which may be made a dead letter by delaying the "compromis."

The court is supposed to sit at The Hague, but may sit elsewhere if obliged to do so. The delegation may, of its own accord, hold its sessions elsewhere with the consent of the parties, if circumstances make a change of place necessary. The court may call upon states to help it in serving notices and securing evidence. It determines the language that is to be used in cases coming before it. It discusses its cases and makes decisions upon them in private session, under the control of a president or vice-president, but a judge who is appointed by one of the parties may not preside. A judge can not serve as a member of the delegation "when the power which appointed him, or of which he is a national, is one of the parties" [Art. 6]. The decisions of the court must be made in writing by a majority of the judges present, who must give the reasons for their opinions and disclose their names. The judgment must be signed by the president and registrar. The court is authorized to improve upon its rules of procedure, but must communicate them to the contracting powers for approval.

The draft of the new court was approved by the second Hague conference, except as to the selection of judges, Switzerland alone reserving its vote, but the court itself has not come into operation. This fact may occasion surprise, but is easily understood when once the present condition of the doctrine of the equality of nations is explained. Theoretically, and, for most purposes, practically, the sovereign states have equal rights in international law, but each is tenacious of its rights, the smaller and the newer states being, if anything, more jealous of them than their larger neighbors. As Mr. Choate put it in his humorous way, in an address at the Harvard Union two or three years ago, Panama can not see why she is not as important as England. But states as big as England take a different view of the matter; they believe that they should have special consideration, and are unwilling to trust their interests to judges appointed by the smaller states on equal terms with themselves.

No plan within the political ingenuity of The Hague conference could determine satisfactorily how 15 judges could be equitably apportioned among 46 States. The rotation scheme adopted for the International Prize Court of 15 judges, those of the greater powers, with correspondingly large maritime interests, 8 in all, Germany, Austria-Hungary, United States, France, Great Britain, Italy, Japan, and Russia, sitting all the time, and those of the smaller powers, according to a classified list, some of the time, in a fixed period of years, though acceptable for the settlement of claims resulting from war, was not acceptable for the adjudication of differences that might cause war. This scheme was defeated by Doctor Barbosa, of Brazil, who declared it was based upon military and naval force instead of upon population and intelligence, and was therefore unjust to the interests of the less powerful states, particularly to those of South America. Probably most men will agree that the world will be better off in the end by adopting a plan that recognizes the equality of nations in every sense of the word; but much is to be said in favor of the rotation system as reported by Professor Scott and others at the conference. Scott in his address showed that the rotation plan was based upon population. This recognizes the material interests of the nations, to which litigation has a proportionate relation. New York, for example, has more legal business than Rhode Island because it is a bigger State than the latter. So England would have more legal business before this court than Panama. This plan also provides for adequate representation of the principal systems of jurisprudence which is essential to international justice.

The appointment of a judge by each of the 46 nations, about 15 judges to serve in three successive groups, was suggested by Senator Barbosa, but his suggestion was afterwards withdrawn. The election of 15 judges by a plurality or majority vote of the secretaries of state of all the nations desiring the court would seem to be a reasonable solution of the problem, but has not been tried. The suggestion is made now, and bids fair to be accepted, that the difficulty be met by conferring the jurisdiction of the court of arbitral justice upon the prize court. Mr. Knox, addressing the Pennsylvania Society of New York, in December, said: "Very recently the State Department has proposed in a circular note to the powers that the prize court should also be invested with the jurisdiction and functions of a court of arbitral justice. The United States as the originator of this project is confidently yet anxiously looking forward to its accetance by the powers, which will give to the world an international judicial body to adjudge cases arising in peace as well as controversies incident to war." This method of constituting the court, as Dr. George W. Kirchwey aptly pointed out in an address in Boston, is a conservative, a lawyer's way of making progress, as it makes use of an already existing institution. The conference left the matter to be adjusted by negotiation. When, therefore, a method of appointing the judges is agreed upon, the new high court of nations will get to work. That it may go into operation soon and become the recognized means of settling the disputes of nations judicially, as is fondly hoped by its distinguished legal advocates, should be the wish of every lawyer and of every friend of international peace.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. CURRIER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message, in writing, from the President of the United States was communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield thirty minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. FOSTER].

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of shocking the membership of the committee, I wish to speak a few moments upon a subject which is at least closely allied with the bill which is supposed to be under consideration. I refer to our consular service. It will be remembered that four year ago Congress passed a bill to reform and improve the consular service of the United States. Up to that time there was no branch of the public service so utterly neglected by the Government as was this. As a rule, the compensation of our consuls were inadequate. In many instances the salary was ridiculously small; in some instances it was only $1,000 per year. No adequate allowances were made for rent or for the maintenance of the consular offices.

American travelers abroad, upon returning home not infrequently had bitter complaints respecting the personnel of the service. While it is undoubtedly true that there were occasional cases where the complaint against the consul was not without foundation, in the majority of instances the criticism should have been directed against the system in vogue and against the Government for its neglect of its officials. These travelers were too frequently chagrined and humiliated by the seedy appearance of our representatives, maintaining an office in some back room in some remote alley. Too often they failed to appreciate the fact that these men were sent abroad by the Government without the means to maintain themselves or their office in a manner compatible with the dignity and importance of the country they were sent to represent. They forgot that in altogether too many instances the Government sent the consul abroad with a mere pittance, and then practically abandoned him to his fate.

By the provisions of the law which we enacted four years ago we did much to place the consular service upon a proper plane. We classified the consulships according to their importance, we substituted salaries for fees, we partially Americanized the service with the expectation that in the near future it would be completely Americanized. We provided that no consul receiving a salary of more than $1,000 shall transact business for compensation outside the service; and, finally, we provided for five inspectors of consulates through whom the State Department is enabled to keep in close touch with all American consuls.

In connection with this law, President Roosevelt issued an executive order which provided for the rigid examination of all candidates for appointment to the service. It further provided that appointments should be made to the lower grades, and that when vacancies occurred in the higher grades they should be filled by promotion from the lower grades.

This law and the executive order of President Roosevelt, which has been continued in force by President Taft, has already resulted in a great improvement in the service. At the time we passed the law just referred to we did not go as far as many of the reformers asked us to go. We were asked to enact a law which embodied the provisions of the law which we enacted and also the provisions of President Roosevelt's executive order. But some of us, remembering that old document which is sometimes referred to as the Constitution, recall that the power to appoint these consuls is placed in the hands of the President, by and with the consent of the Senate. For myself I think this was one of the few mistakes of the fathers. Certainly if I had my way to-day I would place the appointment of these consuls in the hands of the President, thus making it possible to place them under the civil service.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I should like to ask the gentleman one question. I served on the gentleman's committee a long time with a great deal of pleasure, and this matter was always up for agitation. Have the results of the change of the law to which the gentleman refers been anything like the promise that was made of the benefits that were to accrue from it?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I believe so, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If I understand the drift of the gentleman's remarks, he proposes still further changes.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I am coming to that in a moment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not want to interrupt. I want to know whether the thing has panned out according to promise.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I believe that the changes which were instituted by reason of the law which we enacted and the executive order of President Roosevelt have resulted in greatly improving our consular service. When I say that I do not wish to be understood as criticising indiscriminately the personnel of the consular service under the old régime. I believe that the old service was a good service. I believe that as a rule we sent abroad to fill our consular positions patriotic American citizens who did everything in their power to maintain the dignity and prestige of the American name, and to promote our commercial interests in foreign lands.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One more question. Does the gentleman think that the improvement that has been made grows entirely out of the increase of salary, or for other reasons?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The improvement in our consular service has resulted from the law and the executive order to which I have referred. The increases in compensation provided for in that law were extremely moderate. In many instances there was no increase. We cut off the fees and increased the salary by way of compensation. Under the old method there was little hope for promotion from the lower-grade consulships to those of the higher grade. There were few inducements held out to the appointees in these lower-grade offices. You could hardly expect a first-class man, able to speak at least one language besides his own, to be willing to go abroad to one of those consulships with a salary of only $1,500 or $2,000, so long as there was little hope for his promotion to a more important position.

But now when we can say to the man whom it is proposed to appoint to one of these low-grade consulships that if he proves himself a faithful and efficient official, well adapted to the work of the service, he may look forward to being promoted from grade to grade as he grows in experience until he reaches the highest grade with its salary of $12,000 per year, it necessarily follows that men better qualified and better equipped for the service seek appointment. College graduates and other thoroughly educated men who are able to speak one or more languages in addition to their own are taking the examinations which are held from time to time under the direction of the Department of State.

The records of the State Department show that 101 men passed the 7 consular examinations from March, 1907, to November, 1908. These men came from 37 States, Territories, and possessions of the United States. Of this number 44 were graduates of American universities and colleges. Thirty-two took a partial college course and 25 did not go to college. There were 41 successful candidates in the examination for the consular service in November, 1908, mostly university graduates; every man speaking one language besides English, and many familiar with three or four languages, German, Spanish, and French predominating.

But what I want to call to the attention of the committee particularly is the propaganda with its headquarters at Chicago, which is calling for further legislation upon this subject. There is a bill now pending here known as House bill 6862, which practically embodies the provisions of this executive order to which I have referred. This propaganda has been calling upon the business men all over the country to write to their Congressmen, and particularly to the members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, urging them to pass this bill. When we ask them if they think it is constitutional for us to undertake to limit the President in his appointing power, and the Senate in its power of confirmation, they say "Yes;" they believe we have that power under the Constitution.

They call our attention to certain decisions in various States where it has been held that the adoption of civil-service rules as to the selection of officers whose appointment is vested in the governor is not an infringement of or an encroachment upon the rights or powers of the Executive. And if we still protest that we believe we have not the constitutional power to do this, they go further and say that we ought to pass this bill anyway, because, in the first place, if we once put the law on the statute book, placing our consuls under the civil service, thereby limiting the President in his appointment of these consuls to the list of eligibles prepared under the civil service, no one would ever venture to take that law to the courts; that there would be no one to question its constitutionality. No President, they say, would ever venture to disregard the law because of its unconstitutionality, and no President would ever venture to ask any of his friends to take the question to the Supreme Court.

Let me quote from one of those who are urging us to enact a law placing the consular service under the civil service:

> The question of the constitutionality of a law, such as that which is proposed as to the consular service, providing that the exercise of the power of nomination to office, conferred upon the Executive by the Constitution, shall in any wise be limited or regulated by legislation, has never been distinctly passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States. However, by the supreme courts of several of the States, in cases involving civil-service laws, the constitutionality of similar legislation has been sustained as having the effect not of depriving the executive of his constitutional power of nomination, but as simply regulating its exercise; and even though the federal legislators might disagree as to the constitutionality of the proposed consular-service law, it could hardly be doubted that its adoption would be practically effective in guiding the Executive in his exercise of the nominating power in accordance with the merit system.

Therefore these people say that if we once place it upon the statute book it will remain there; that the longer it is acquiesced in the stronger will be the argument of acquiescence should the law be taken to the Supreme Court. So I say we are receiving letters from all over the country urging us to enact into law House bill 6862.

In order, therefore, that my position as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs may not be misunderstood, and in order that I may say something in reply to these many letters which I have received from all parts of our country, I wish to discuss briefly the question involved. The Constitution vests in the President, by and with the consent of the Senate, the power to appoint our consuls. To many of us it would seem a violation of the Constitution to enact a law which would in any way restrict this constitutional power of the Chief Executive. And to me it is a serious question whether a Member of the House should vote for a bill the provisions of which he earnestly believes to be unconstitutional. Before entering upon the duties of our office as Members of this House we are required to take an oath to support the Constitution. What do we mean when we swear that we will support the Constitution? If we have an abiding faith that a pending measure is unconstitutional, can we vote for such measure and assure ourselves that we are supporting the Constitution? I believe that every man is bound to decide for himself, first of all in view of his oath, whether the pending legislation is constitutional. Of course there may be a doubt. And if a Member has an honest doubt he may well say that the question of constitutionality should be left to the Supreme Court. But where he is possessed of the conviction that the proposed legislation is unconstitutional, then it seems to me that he should vote against it.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, would it annoy the gentleman if I ask him one question?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Not at all.

Mr. PERKINS. Has the gentleman in connection with his study of this question investigated the power given the President to appoint officers in the army and navy, and then considered the legislation by which Congress, by laws which have been in force for a very long period, has regulated that, and does he think there is any analogy to be drawn from that that might affect the question he is now discussing?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I have studied that question, and I believe that the same constitutional question applies there as applies here.

Mr. PERKINS. So do I.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Indeed, the chief argument of the people who are urging this legislation is that it is analogous to the legislation to which the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] refers. Let me quote:

> Congress simply was asked to establish, with the President's concurrence, the same sort of rules for appointments in the consular service that have long been established and maintained in regard to appointments in the army and navy. Regulations of this kind are practically effective, and there is no earthly reason why Congress and the President should not agree upon them just as they have agreed upon them as to the army and navy. The difference between regulations so agreed upon, incorporated in a statute, and regulations made by the President alone is largely a difference of permanence. If they are put in the statute they will continue indefinitely. If they are only established by an executive order, they are liable to be changed as administrations change.

These people reason that as the laws referred to by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PERKINS] were never taken to the Supreme Court, and because those most interested have long acquiesced in them, therefore we should enact this legislation which they demand in the faith that no one would venture to raise the question of constitutionality. In this way they would have us amend the Constitution. There may be some people who honestly believe that this proposed legislation would be entirely constitutional. But so convinced am I of its unconstitutionality that I can imagine only one condition under which I would be willing to consider the propriety of my giving it my support. If the President of the United States should indicate to the Senate that he favors the passage of such a law, and if the Senate, which has, with the Executive, a part in the appointment of these consuls, should thereupon pass a bill restricting the selection of these consuls to men who have passed the civil-service examination and have got their names upon the list of eligibles, I should certainly deem it my duty to consider most carefully the constitutional question involved. But I want to say once for all to these good people who are continually writing and urging us to enact this kind of legislation that until the Senate does take the initiative I shall oppose any such legislation here.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to the gentleman's speech with a great deal of interest, and I am not sure from the last remark that he has made whether I get the full import of his argument. I understood him to say that in his judgment this proposed bill was unconstitutional.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. In my judgment it is so.

Mr. SLAYDEN. Now, I understand him to say that if its enactment should be initiated in the Senate and it should be sent here he might be inclined to support it. Am I right?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Not at all. What I did state, or what I intended to state, was that the only circumstance under which I would consider the question of voting for a bill containing the provisions which this bill contains is that the Senate should pass such a bill upon the recommendation of the Executive, and that the bill should come here for consideration. Whether it is constitutional or not, I meant to say I would not think of supporting a bill originating in this House which encroached in any way upon the rights or privileges of the other body. Such a bill ought to originate at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. And it is very doubtful, I say, whether under those circumstances I would support such a bill.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I was under the impression, Mr. Chairman, from my understanding of the gentleman's speech, that he had practically announced his willingness to waive his constitutional objection in the event that the bill should originate in the Senate.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Oh, no. I meant to say that I believe to-day that this bill is unconstitutional; that in view of this belief and in view of the fact that the proposed legislation would be an encroachment upon the constitutional powers of the Senate, I should not think of giving such legislation my support unless it originated in the Senate; that even then I should not give it my support unless in the end I modified my present judgment as to its constitutionality. If in the end and under those circumstances I should come to the conclusion that there was a reasonable doubt as to the correctness of my views I would give the proposed measure my support.

Mr. SLAYDEN. I must apologize to my friend for tresspassing on his time, but it was my interest in the legislation which we have on hand which induced me to do so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Let me ask the gentleman this question: Suppose the President should recommend this and the Senate should pass it, would that in any way change the constitutionality of it?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Not in the least.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It would be simply persuasive that it was.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes, persuasive. Where we have two parties to whom belongs the appointing power willing to circumscribe that power the assumption is that they believe they have the constitutional right to so circumscribe their power. And naturally such action would have its weight with me in determining my course.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One other question. Suppose the President recommended—taking an extreme case—and the Senate unanimously passed it, and the House unanimously passed it, and the President signs it, and he goes out of office, and some President should happen to come in who did not believe the thing was constitutional and should proceed to exercise his undoubted right to appoint whomsoever he pleased, then where would your law be?

Mr. HENRY W. PALMER. In the soup.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. HOWARD. Will the gentleman permit me to direct his attention to one other feature of this legislation in regard to this service, which is the organization of a system of consular inspection? I think the gentleman omitted to allude to that. A system of consular inspection; and as a result of that consular inspection reports are made to the State Department, and no promotions are made from the lower to the higher grade without being based on these actual practical results of men's achievements.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, perhaps the gentleman from Georgia was not in during the early part of my remarks. I called attention to that as one of the most important features of the new law. I stated that under the old system these consuls were sent abroad and oftentimes practically abandoned by the Government; that much of the criticism that was made of the personnel of the consular service at that time was due to the fact that our consuls were underpaid and neglected by the Government; that now the State Department, through these inspectors, keeps in close touch with all the consular officers and is fully informed as to the needs of each.

Mr. KEIFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. KEIFER. As I understood the distinguished gentleman from Vermont, he announced an entirely new doctrine, and I wanted to see whether I am right about it; and that is, it would be our duty as Members of the House to waive our constitutional scruples and grant the necessary form of laws to the Executive and Senate, if they decided they wanted to experiment in the matter of something in relation to the consular service that was entirely unconstitutional.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. No; the gentleman misunderstood me.

Mr. KEIFER. I understood the gentleman to say if they wanted to enter upon that the gentleman would waive his objections as to its constitutionality.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. The gentleman misunderstood me. What I attempted to say was, that aside from the constitutional question involved, the Senate should take the initiative in legislation of this kind, for the reason that its effect would be to circumscribe the powers of the Senate. Aside from all other considerations, I should hesitate long before giving my support to a House bill providing for any encroachment upon the rights, privileges, or powers of the Senate. On the other hand, if the Senate should initiate legislation upon the subject under discussion, such action would in itself have its weight with me in determining our constitutional right to enact such legislation. It would, of course, not be conclusive. And I might add that all this talk is thoroughly academic, for no one familiar with the course taken by the Senate in connection with the legislation that was passed four years ago relative to our consular service has any apprehension that the Senate will ever take any such initiative.

Mr. KEIFER. Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the gentleman on his last statement, for I mistook him before, and thought he was entering upon something entirely new as to our duty.

Mr. SHERLEY. Mr. Chairman, I did not hear all the statement of the gentleman, and so he may have covered what I am about to ask him. Have you discussed the question of whether Congress in creating the office of consul at any particular place can make certain requirements as to the person to fill such place?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Mr. Chairman, I have not discussed that question; but I have investigated it and have studied it, and I am of the opinion that Congress can not, as to consuls.

Mr. SHERLEY. Of course, the gentleman admits that Congress can create as many or as few of these consular positions as it sees fit?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. Yes.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, now, what constitutional provision would prevent Congress, in fixing the places, from determining the character of the person to be appointed? Suppose it should put into the act that a consul should be appointed to a given country, who should be of the age of 35. Does the gentleman think that that requirement as to age would be an encroachment upon the prerogative of the President and Senate?

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I certainly do, Mr. Chairman. The Constitution vests in the President the right to appoint consuls, and it is my present judgment that Congress can enact no law that would in any way restrict that right.

Mr. SHERLEY. Well, the proposition that seems to me to be involved is this: Of course, I agree with the gentleman that Congress can not designate to the President whom he shall appoint, but Congress, in creating the office, may create that office with such restrictions as to practically require the appointment of men who come within the requirement of the act.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I think, Mr. Chairman, that this is analagous to the position taken by many of the advocates of this proposed legislation which I have discussed. They say that in many of the States the courts have held that the enactment of civil-service laws as to the appointment of officers whose appointment is vested in the governor is no restriction upon the right of the governor to appoint.

Mr. SHERLEY. Does the gentleman consider that the qualification of the man, that, for instance, he should be a natural-born American, would be an encroachment upon the prerogative of the President? I am trying to put some broad classification so as to see if the gentleman goes to the full extent of saying that when the office is created it will be without any restriction on the power of the President.

Mr. FOSTER of Vermont. I think the latter is true. We are absolutely limited. As I said before, I think it is one of the few mistakes the fathers made in not placing the appointment of all consular officers in the hands of the President, and I repeat that I have taken the time of the committee principally for the purpose of saying to these people who have written us urging this legislation that I am opposed to it not because I am in favor of the "spoils system" rather than the "merit system," but because I am possessed of the abiding faith that we have not the constitutional power to enact any such legislation.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I take the liberty of yielding myself two minutes, because I would like to ask my friend from Kentucky a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky is recognized for two minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Kentucky suggested the very interesting question whether, Congress having the power by statute to appoint a consular officer at a certain place, it could not as a part of the appointment restrict in a certain way the manner in which the appointment should be made. Without expressing any opinion as to that, I would like to ask the gentleman from Kentucky if he does not recognize the fact that the President of the United States, with the consent of the Senate, but without any authority by act of Congress, can send ambassadors and consuls anywhere he pleases? Of course they will not get any pay unless Congress appropriates it, but I think the gentleman will find that the President would have the power, with the consent of the Senate, to designate anybody to go as ambassador or consul to any place.

Mr. SHERLEY. Frankly, my question was not the result of any study, and I did not have in mind whether the provisions of the Constitution gave the President the power of appointing such an officer as a consul. What I did have in mind was, simply assuming that the office had to be created (which may be a false assumption, and which I am inclined from the suggestion of the gentleman to believe was a false one), whether Congress could not in so creating it put certain qualifications concerning the appointee to such office.

Mr. PERKINS. I ask the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. HOWARD] to consume some of his time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY].

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a few days ago the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] honored me by addressing himself to my remarks recently made in the House of Representatives touching the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill.

For a number of years it has been our pleasure to listen to this annual tariff speech of the distinguished gentleman. He is pleasing in diction, ornate in rhetoric, and withal a Representative of fine ability. In addition to these charms he now has the further one of being a correct prophet.

In the beginning of his remarks he said:

The Payne tariff act must justify itself, or the Republican party must go out of power.

In all his career the gentleman never uttered a truer prophecy. The Payne-Aldrich tariff measure is not justifying itself, and the Republican party will go out of power. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

When I read the speech it seemed proper that I should address myself to answering any argument the able gentleman might have made. After thoroughly reading it, I found it to be not an argument, but a delight characterized by the poet when he penned his immortal lines:

> But pleasures are like poppies spread,
> You seize the flower, its bloom is shed;
> Or, like the snowfall in the river,
> A moment white, then melts forever.
>
> Or like the borealis race that flit
> Ere you can mark the place;
> Or like the rainbow's lovely form,
> Evanishing amid the storm.

[Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman charged the Democracy as being the party of "calamity" and arraigned us as "calamity howlers." We dispute it and say that the Democracy is not the party of calamity howlers, and here assert that you gentlemen have become the party of calamity. And to demonstrate the truthfulness of this assertion permit me to make proffer of the official resolutions introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE], the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, and the two introduced at the other end of the Capitol by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], wherein all these gentlemen deplore the prices of the necessities of life, abnormal prices, and the swelling tide of living expenses. These resolutions from the Republican party are the official warning that calamity is abroad in the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.] You gentlemen have become the official spokesmen of the calamity howlers, and have introduced resolutions to ascertain the cause of this great rise in prices and "abnormal" conditions throughout the land. We earnestly protest against your partisan Ways and Means Committee making the investigation, as proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE]. We fear your verdict and here now challenge the array of jurors and ask that a new jury be impaneled. For just and legal cause we challenge such persons as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] as being highly warped, prejudiced, and having a mind irrevocably made up. If the other jurors are so prejudiced we know the verdict of your Ways and Means Committee on the proposed investigation, and the merest novice can foretell a whitewash as the result. It would be a strange progenitor to find judgment against his own progeny, and we warn the country, deny the impartiality of your committee, and beg for another tribunal and forum. Gentlemen, you need not trouble yourselves about the investigation.

The people everywhere have already investigated, and will write the verdict at the first election held in the United States. Did you see the blazing lights of Democratic victory thrown athwart the skies in Missouri the other day in the district so long represented by that great master of satire, logic, and debate, the lamented David A. De Armond, where the Democracy increased their majority 2,000 votes? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Gentlemen, we refuse to allow you to select the category in which we are to be placed. We do not intend for you to limit the investigation to the increased prices of food products, but you must make it broader. And it must cover the questions of increased cost of all living expenses, as witnessed to-day throughout the land. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Illinois read a part of the speech made by me. Permit me to reread it, in order that I may state some plain and pertinent facts in reply. He quoted from my remarks as follows:

> Deliberately considering the Payne-Aldrich bill, I here state that, after a most exhaustive analysis, in my judgment it is the most outrageous tax measure ever placed upon the statutes of any government in Christendom.
> The plighted faith was not kept, but cruelly broken, and the demands for lighter tax burdens answered with a law piling the load still higher upon a groaning people.

Standing here to-day I deliberately reiterate the statement and decline to withdraw the charges then made. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman has added another laurel to his wreath. He has become the humorist of his side of the House. You will find in perusing his speech that he states he will not say the Payne tariff law "has brought additional prosperity" in the United States. He contends that it made our condition no worse. Gentlemen, why all the talk about revision last year if conditions were good; why did you go before the people and promise it if this bill has not added any prosperity to our country, but has left us where we were?

With great gusto he quoted from a Texas governor's message, repeating a platform of the state Democracy. The quotation reads:

Recognizing that the rice and oil industry are of great importance to the growth of the State, we recommend legislation that will protect them.

He should have known, as we all know, that this platform did not refer to tariffs and federal revenue laws. It meant only local state laws and policies. Texans are not for protection in any form, and Texas Democracy stands by the ancient landmarks of revenue tariffs and against the doctrine of protected industries. The gentleman misread, misconstrued, and misunderstood the state platform quoted, and does rank injustice to true Texas Democracy.

ATTEMPTED PROOF OF TEXAS PROSPERITY BY NEWSPAPER GREETINGS.

The gentleman read from some newspapers in my district a selection of Christmas and New Year carols, written as editorials, before the good cheer of the holiday feasts had died away. Thus he endeavored to prove prosperity in Texas and the South.

The refrains read:

[Waco Times-Herald editorial, January 2, 1910.]

Yes, Waco is going to have a sky scraper, which is a demonstration that some of us, brethren beloved, are confident as to her future. But shall we be content with one? Why not a dozen sky scrapers? Shall we not make it possible for Sanger Brothers to come to the corner with a magnificent structure? And shall we not have a vision of a royal palace for Goldstein & Migel? And shall we not be getting ready to greet the Mistrots in marble hall? The list can be indefinitely extended if only our old men will dream dreams and our young men see visions.

[Editorial, January 15, 1910.]

This is to be Waco's best and biggest year, unless all signs fail. Put your money in Waco dirt.

But they have not been able to hold us back; we are making progress. Ourselves the recipients of favors from those gone before, we recognize our obligations to those who are to come after, and hence constant endeavor, from which will issue the greatest commonwealth in the American Union.

And this is the gentleman's proof of prosperity in my home city and the Eleventh Congressional District. I thank him for the compliment, but wish to say we are prospering there in spite of the Payne-Aldrich bill and the Republican administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

CONTRASTING THE PROSPERITY OF THE ELEVENTH DISTRICT WITH THAT OF MR. BOUTELL.

In the colloquy with the gentleman from Illinois that day, I stated that conditions were not so good in his district and in the city of Chicago, and referred to the fact that school children had been sent to the public schools morning after morning without breakfast. In his usual affable way he denied the statement. Permit me to read from an official report of the board of education to demonstrate my charges. The report is entitled: "Chicago Public Schools. Report on Underfed Children." And it is dated October 21, 1908. The report is made by Prof. W. L. Bodine, and he states in the letter now held by me that his statements were challenged at the time, but that he "made good." These same conditions still exist in Chicago, and I commend them to the thoughtful consideration of my friend from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL]:

1. Five thousand children who attend the schools of Chicago are habitually hungry. They often go to school breakfastless, and at times go to bed hungry. As a result of being underfed and living in insanitary homes they have become victims of malnutrition—which creates subnormal children.

2. I further report that 10,000 other children in the city—while not such extreme cases as the aforesaid—do not have sufficient nourishing food; that the lack of "a square deal and a square meal" at home often presents the pathetic sequel of the child who is backward at study and forward in delinquency.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman a question right there.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will yield, if it is only a question.

Mr. RUCKER of Missouri. I want to ask the gentleman if there is anything in the article, or if the gentleman from Illinois said anything about the fact which has been printed in the papers, that in Chicago they are actually selling white babies for $1 to $3 apiece?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. No; that state of affairs was too grim for this optimistic humorist. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Further reading the report, we find:

4. In the canvass made by truant officers, mothers were repeatedly found who go to bed hungry themselves in order that their children may have a scant breakfast next day. This self-denial is habitual heroism in some large families, where the rations are scarce—particularly among widows and deserted wives.

Again we find—

A. Armour school district.—Father out of work, mother sick, and not a scrap of food in the house. Five children; three half naked, and one garbed only in an undershirt, crying for bread. For three days they had lived on tea—no bread, milk, nor sugar.

Permit me to read another horrible revelation:

I. Drummond school district.—Family of seven; no food in the house; father out of work; went to the lake to commit suicide, but changed his mind and committed a misdemeanor in order to be locked up at West Chicago Avenue Police Station and get a prison meal. Lack of shoes and hunger often interfered with children's school attendance.

* * * * * * *

I estimated the total number of children in Chicago who do not receive three square meals daily at 15,000.

Mr. BURKE of Pennsylvania. The name of one of the children would be gratifying.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. A voice from Pittsburg, Pa., the storm center of many strikes. The report makes our blood run with feelings of horror by further stating:

7. We find that a large number of children have only bread saturated in water for breakfast day after day; that the noon meal is bread or bananas, and an occasional luxury of soup made from pork bones; that children often frequent South Water street begging for dead fowl in the crates or decayed fruit; that others have been found searching for food in alley garbage boxes, and several cases were reported where hungry children at school picked up crusts of bread or fragments of lunch which other children had thrown away.

These are the Chicago public schools. I have a letter from the superintendent of the compulsory department saying these conditions exist in that great city. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

And now let me propound to my friend an honest query: If the tariff bill has brought prosperity to my district and Texas and the South, why has it not also come to Chicago? The gentleman spoke of "groaning" in Texas. Is there any "groaning" out in Chicago? Answer me fairly, why the difference? We intend to meet these questions, and shall not evade any of them. You gentlemen promised the American people downward revision of the tariff. You won in the election and came back to this body, and fell by the wayside in your promises. The bill you passed and used to call the "Payne Act" is spelled "pain" now, so onerous have become its burdens. [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

TEXAS—HER RESOURCES, PROGRESS, AND POSSIBILITIES.

Mr. Chairman, grant me indulgence while I engage in the delightful task of briefly dwelling on Texas, my native State. Permit me to show something of her power, grandeur, and possibilities.

In 1820 that great Democrat, Mr. Jefferson, wrote of Texas:

And to us the province of Techas will be the greatest State of our Union, without exception. Its southern part will make more sugar than we can consume, and the Red River on its north is the most luxuriant country on earth.

Thus he wrote in 1820, before Mexico had been disenthralled from the dominion of Spain, ere Texas had achieved her independence and become a republic in 1836, before she came into the Union. Jefferson foresaw that ultimately Texas would come under that flag, out of Spanish thralldom, destined to be one of the greatest of the sisterhood of States. And now we are proud that we can stand under yonder ample folds above the distinguished Speaker's head while speaking for 5,000,000 of people. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

In area we have 264,280 square miles. We are larger in territory than all of New England, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Illinois, and Indiana combined, more extensive than the original thirteen States of the Union, almost six times the size of the State of Pennsylvania, and nearly six times the size of the State of New York. We are greater in size than the Republic of France. In 1860, at the beginning of the civil war, we had less than 300 miles of railroad. Now we have more than 14,000, and are first in railroad mileage. Every year we build more miles of railway than any other State. Annually we establish more banks. We came into the Union on January 1, 1846, and had a population of less than 100,000 people. And from that year to this we have increased to 5,000,000 living, breathing, and happy souls. When we entered the Union we were the twenty-fifth State in population, and are now the fifth. And, perhaps, the next census will make Texas the third, and certainly the fourth in population. By the official decennial censuses we have grown rapidly, to wit:

	Population.
Second Census, twenty-fifth State, 1850	212,592
Third Census, twenty-third State, 1860	604,215
Fourth Census, nineteenth State, 1870	818,579
Fifth Census, eleventh State, 1880	1,591,749
Sixth Census, seventh State, 1890	2,235,523
Seventh Census, fifth State, 1900	3,000,000

With the pending census we will outstrip Ohio and Illinois and stand face to face with Pennsylvania in population. Within the next generation we will pass beyond our sisters and stand without a rival commonwealth in all the earth in population, resources, fertility of soil, and productive capacity. Then, as now, we will continue to smile, prosper, and drive gaunt hunger and poverty from the land. Our material growth and prosperity are attested by our taxable values and increases as follows:

They were in—

1850	$51,814,615
1860	294,315,659
1870	170,473,778
1880	311,470,736
1890	782,111,883
1900	946,320,258
1909	2,309,893,626

And thus we grew, in sunshine and storm, under Republican and Democratic rule. We leaped forward in spite of mere party policies and administrations of government. No mere power of men retarded us in our onward progress.

ONE HISTORIC REPUBLICAN HINDRANCE.

But, Mr. Chairman, we did have one Republican misfortune, and it is mentioned here not for the purpose of arousing partisan rancor. The reference is made only to show the giant strength of Texas to overcome any adversity. There was an administration in Texas that cruelly handicapped us. It was one of those wicked Republican administrations that sometimes befall a State. Permit me to read from the pen of one of our most gifted historians, a gentleman once occupying a seat in this body:

THE ADMINISTRATION OF E. J. DAVIS.

His administration was one of boundless extravagance, disorderly and lawless despotism, increasing disregard of every principle of personal and political liberty, and it brought utter ruin to the best interests of the State and its citizens. He was given enormous power and patronage by the legislature; he used them in the most reckless and arbitrary manner. He established a state police, officered by petty tyrants and composed of disreputable adventurers. He assumed the right to declare martial law whenever and wherever his authority was resisted, and he reduced whole counties and districts to a state of terrorism and outlawry.

To overthrow this dreadful administration there was a nonpartisan convention called in Austin. It was composed of the finest citizens in Texas of all parties, and breathed forth patriotism in every act and utterance. Of this convention the historian referred to says:

That convention ascertained and published to the world the fact that the two legislatures of 1870 and 1871 had appropriated for the expenses of the Government the enormous sum of $3,752,375, besides subsidies granted to railroads amounting to $14,000,000; and the state and county tax was $2.17½ on each $100, besides poll, occupation, and license taxes.

Mr. Chairman, in spite of such disaster, Texas, like Antæus, with renewed strength from mother earth rose and pressed forward. And despite that terrible nightmare, the McKinley law, the Dingley and Payne acts, we are still growing and prospering. [Applause on the Democratic side.] All our administrations have been democratic since then. It is true there is not much groaning in Texas. And it is certain there is much groaning throughout the land. We are willing to address our cause to the forum of public conscience and try it upon the real facts, and will not run away from the contest. Yes; the gentleman's prophecy is correct when he says this bill must justify itself or the Republican party must go out of business. [Applause on the Democratic side.] It can not justify itself. because you did not keep your word with the American people and reduce the tariff schedules as you pledged them. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Let me here read what your President said on the subject of downward revision, and it will be often read. I believe he intended to keep his word when he made the promise. Unfortunately, he found it impossible when engaging in conflict with the body at the other end of the Capitol. He said:

It is my judgment that the revision of the tariff, in accordance with the pledge of the Republican platform, will be, on the whole, a substantial revision downward, though there probably will be a few exceptions in this regard.

Did you keep that promise made to the American people? This is the question that must be answered.

THE PRICE OF COTTON THIS YEAR NOT TOO HIGH.

The gentleman asked me this question:

Mr. BOUTELL. Does the gentleman think prices are too high?
Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly I think prices are too high.
Mr. BOUTELL. What, does the gentleman want to lower the price on cotton? [Laughter and applause on Republican side.]
Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to say to the gentleman——
Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be interrupted until I answer these remarks, until I have answered the questions the gentleman has asked me.
Mr. HENRY of Texas. Let me complete my answer.

The gentleman still refused to yield to me. He asked me if I thought the price of cotton was too high, and declined to yield in order that I might answer him. I am going to reply to that question now and not run away. He shall have the answer.

No; I do not think the price of cotton is too high nor the other things produced by the farmers of this country. The difficulty we have is not at the farm. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The price of cotton is not high enough. After the gentleman had declined to yield, he assumed a histrionic attitude, as much as to say to this House and the country that the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill was responsible for the good price of cotton. Ah, what logic! What humor! Does the gentleman mean to say that the Payne-Aldrich tariff measure raised the price of cotton this year? Now, gentlemen, I want to show you just exactly how much the Payne-Aldrich bill did for the price of cotton, and I wish the gentleman to answer me. Here is the free list: Cotton and cotton waste or flocks. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Payne-Aldrich tariff act placed cotton on the free list, and yet he would have the country believe that the law advocated by him and his party is responsible for the present good price of cotton. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from Illinois is a member of the Ways and Means Committee; he was a tariff conferee last summer.

Let me give you some more facts in regard to that great staple which are of significant interest touching the points involved.

COTTON PRODUCED IN UNITED STATES—PRICES AND EXPORTS.

It is interesting here to invite your attention to the amount of cotton produced in the United States during the last few years, the prices, and the quantity exported. We ascertain the facts to be as follows:

Year.	Crop.	Average price.	Exported.	Value.
	Bales.	Cents.
1907	11,375,461	11.5	9,036,434	$481,277,797
1908	13,587,306	9.2	7,633,997	437,788,202
1909	10,088,000	13.92	.....	.....

In 1907 the amount of cotton was over 11,375,000 bales, and the price a little over 11 cents, and of that we exported over 9,000,000 bales. In 1908 we raised over 13,500,000 bales and the price was a little above 9 cents, and we exported more than 7,500,000. In 1909, the shortest crop in years, we raised around 10,000,000 bales and the price went as high as 13 and 14 and 15 cents. And yet with a crop exceedingly short we will probably export 9,000,000 bales of that amount.

Figuring on the basis of the last official exports, we will proportionately ship as much this year as we did in 1908. And in view of such conditions the member of the Ways and Means Committee and conference committee would induce this House to believe that the Payne bill raised the price of cotton. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Mr. Chairman, the gentleman said the Republican party and tariff laws have done much for the farmers of the South and made them prosperous. Let me show you what they did for the farmer under the Dingley act, which went into effect in 1897. In 1898 the price of cotton was 5.9 cents per pound, in 1899 it was 5.4 cents, and in 1900 7.7 cents, and continued exceedingly low until last year, when the crop was short. The gentleman [Mr. BOUTELL] insists that the Payne bill gave cotton its good price. It is the irrepealable and immutable law of supply and demand throughout the world that has brought cotton to its present prices. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.] In 1907 we exported cotton to the value of $481,277,797, and in 1908 it ran as high as $437,788,202. Hence, the alleged argument by the gentleman that the tariff act fixed the good price of cotton will not commend itself to any thoughtful person. The effect of that law is no more related to the prices of cotton than an oriental tale delightfully recited by the versatile conferee on the Payne-Aldrich measure.

FOR THE AMERICAN FARMER—A WHOLESOME AND SALUTARY RESPECT FOR HIM.

Prefacing what I shall say of the American farmer and his position in our society and government, let me quote Mr. Jefferson:

Those who labor in the earth are the chosen people of God, if He had a chosen people, whose hearts He has made His peculiar depository for genuine and substantial virtue. It is the focus in which He has kept alive that sacred fire which otherwise might escape from the earth. Corruption in morals in the mass of the cultivators of the earth is a phenomenon of which no nation or age can furnish an example. It is the mark set on those who, not looking up to heaven, to their own toil and industry, as does the husbandman, for their subsistence, depend for it on the casualties and caprice of customers. Generally speaking, the proportion which the aggregate of other classes of citizens in any State bears to that of the husbandman is the proportion of its unsound to its healthy parts, and a good barometer whereby to measure its degree of corruption. The mobs of great cities add just as much to the support of pure government as sores do to the strength of the human body.

A tribute in which I cheerfully join with all my heart.

And now, what have these gentlemen done for the farmer in the South and throughout the land to make him prosperous? Forty per cent of our population live in rural precincts and 60 per cent in the cities, yet this 40 per cent produce about 70 per cent of our exports. [Applause on the Democratic side.] When you talk about benefits to the farmer derived from such laws as this, we deny it and charge that the Republican party, instead of helping the farmers, has trampled them under foot. The gentleman contends that you have raised the price of cotton. And when we from the South urged that cotton bagging and ties be placed on the free list, you put a burden and a tax on them in order to lay a bounty at the feet of the American steel trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That is an example of the way you have helped the cotton farmer.

HOW THE FARMERS CONTRIBUTE TO PROSPERITY AND COMFORT OF PEOPLE AT HOME AND ABROAD.

There are more than 10,000,000 of people engaged in agriculture in the United States and 7,000,000 in manufacturing enterprises. The total agricultural products of the United States in 1909 were $8,760,000,000. Included in the above are animal products to the amount of $3,000,000,000. Of those products we exported last year $903,000,000, about 10 per cent of the whole product. In 1907 we produced on the farms products amounting to $7,412,000,000. Out of such total of farm products in that year we exported, including meat products, $1,055,000,000. The aggregate domestic merchandise exported in 1907 was $1,853,718,034. Of this vast sum of exports, farm products constituted about 64 per cent. Ah, what a glorious tribute to the farmer and the American farms! Permit me to cite some other facts about the wealth of the agricultural resources as we annually contribute to feeding and clothing the world. In the production, value, exports, and imports of wheat, cattle, meat, and dairy products, the following figures give charm to thoughtful consideration:

Production, value, exports, and imports of wheat and cattle.

WHEAT.

	Number.	Price.	Exports.	Value.
1907 ..... bushels..	634,087,000	$0.79	146,700,425	$115,893,335
1908 ..... do....	664,602,000	.99	163,043,669	161,413,232

1907	$8,178,559	$202,392,508
1908	8,877,183	192,802,708

In 1907 we raised over 630,000,000 bushels of wheat and exported more than 146,000,000 bushels. In 1908 we produced 664,000,000 bushels and exported 163,000,000 bushels; and so with substantially everything produced by the American farmer. A large percentage of this is shipped abroad, and the tariff that you put in this bill making pretense of protection to the American farmer is a humbug and amounts to nothing. The farmer produces the vast bulk of our exports, and yet you seek to cajole him by saying you have protected him against foreign competition. What a colossal piece of absurdity. You herald to the world, "We have protected the farmer on his corn 15 cents a bushel, wheat 25 cents per bushel, barley 30 cents per bushel, his cattle, hogs, oats, and so forth, so much," and yet you know he is shipping abroad all these things every year, and this so-called "protection" to him is a miserable snare and delusion and grotesque farce. The farmer produces these things and ships them abroad, and yet when he returns and wants to bring in an agricultural implement, a woolen suit of clothes, shoes for his children, utensils for his kitchen, and furniture for his household, the custom-house official meets him and says, in effect, "You must pay tribute under the tariff law to the trusts and combinations of this country before you bring these things into the United States." [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. If it is a short question.

Mr. LONGWORTH. For a short question. I merely want to ask the gentleman whether he does not know that the Payne law decreased the duties on almost every one of those articles he has just mentioned?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. You may have decreased the duties on a few, but only reduced 6 per cent of the 100 per cent of the schedules, and they are yet prohibitory. Now, later in these remarks I want to read a little further from your President. I want your attention to this—the gentleman, a member of the Ways and Means Committee:

Does the gentleman from Illinois think the price of beef is too high in Chicago?

Mr. BOUTELL. Well, with prime heavy steers selling in the gentleman's district at $10 upon the hoof, I do not see how the people in Chicago can buy them for $6 on the hoof. Does the gentleman want to repeal the duty on cattle?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. BOUTELL. Does the gentleman want to repeal the duty on cattle to help lower the price?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I hope to make myself explicit, and shall plainly answer all questions before concluding. Where we in Texas get $80 for a Texas steer, the beef trust gets $400 and much more from the starving citizens of Chicago and the people throughout the country.

Mr. BOUTELL. Then will the gentleman from Texas favor the repeal of the duty on cattle?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I want to ask the gentleman how will you reduce the price? You say it is too high in Chicago.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will you repeal the duty on cattle?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I will agree to repeal every protective duty in your bill, and the duty on meats dressed and shipped into this country. And furthermore, I will agree to put every one of those beef-trust magnates in the penitentiary. Will the gentleman from Chicago help me to do the same thing? [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. To whom does the gentleman refer?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. The beef trust.

Mr. BOUTELL. Who are the beef trust?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Do you not know? And you from Chicago! If you do not, then those starving children will haunt you in your dreams, and their fathers will be swift to remove you from Congress. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, I decline to yield further, just as the gentleman did the other day.

Mr. BOUTELL. That is a very excellent place to stop.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am stopping just like you did on cotton the other day when requested to yield to me to answer your question. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE PRICE OF BEEF.

The gentleman speaks of the good prices we received for Texas beeves. It is not enough yet. It should be still more, considering the years, expense, attention, and investment our farmers and stock raisers have at issue. The great prices are received after the cattle go beyond the control of the farmer and into the hands of the trust. I can not better illustrate than to quote an apt and pertinent illustration from Senator MCCUMBER. He said in the Senate a few days ago:

Now, what are the comparative prices that are received by the farmer and that are received here? I have before me a bill of fare taken from the United States Senate café down here. I look at that bill of fare, and I observe the prices of steaks. I notice that the ordinary sirloin will run from $1.15 up to $3 per service. I notice that the tenderloin will run about the same; and I find that the porterhouse will run from $2 up to about $4 in the ordinary restaurant.

I had a meat man a short time ago give me an estimate of what a 4-year-old steer would bring if served at one of the restaurants here in the city of Washington at these rates, taking all the items that you will find in this list, and he estimated that it would bring from $2,000 to $3,000. The farmer's price is about $60 to $80, with all of the four years that he expended upon that steer. With the little additional work, thirty minutes in the city of Chicago and transporting him here to the city of Washington and cooking him at your café, he advances from $70 to $2,500 or $3,000—enough to pay half the price of a farm. Yet the people who are paying those prices for this same steer served are introducing bills in Congress and asking that the tariff or protection be taken away from the farmer's product on which he has expended all these years of labor.

If you repeal the duty on cattle, the farmer and cattle raiser will not get the benefit. The beef trust will buy up the imported product and still keep the prices high and above the power of people of limited means to purchase meat. Besides, we export cattle and meats. There is no source from whence cattle can come to us now beyond the United States. There is no present supply to draw from. The prices would remain the same at the farms, and the packers and trusts would engross the supply and pile the prices still higher upon the consumer.

YOUR PLATFORM, PRESIDENT, AND PARTY MAKE PROMISES ONLY TO BE BROKEN HERE.

Reiterating my statement, I am here again to-day to arraign the Payne-Aldrich tariff bill. A few years ago you were all standpatters. Then the murmurings from home produced a crop of revisionists. Then the storm rumbled, the crop increased, and you all became revisionists. Your convention at Chicago fairly howled for revision. On the stump you vied with one another in enthusiasm for revision. Mr. Taft, with his great brain and heart, at Milwaukee said, in effect: "Fear not, revision is at hand. We have promised it, and you shall have it." He meant it, but simply has not had the power to redeem the pledge. Environment overcame his intent. After the bill passed last fall, at Winona he said:

With respect to the wool schedule, I agree that it is too high, and that it ought to have been reduced. I am not saying that the tariff does not increase prices in clothing and in building and in the other items that enter into the necessities of life.

What did the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] say? He said the act had fixed the prosperity of the country. And yet Mr. Taft, whom I will not disparage, whose great heart beat in unison with the American masses, proclaimed last fall:

I will not deny that the tariff does increase the prices in clothing and in building and in the other items that enter into the necessities of life.

Why did the President change his views? I shall not conjecture nor impugn his motives, but give you the language from his lips. He said at Winona:

The interests of the party required me to sacrifice the accomplishment of certain things in the revision of the tariff which I had hoped for, in order to maintain party solidarity.

"The interests of the party required" him to sacrifice his solemn pledge of downward revision! In behalf of party solidarity! [Applause on the Democratic side.] He did not heed the cries of idle men traversing the Republic seeking employment. His ears were closed to starving children and wailing and groaning of pale-faced mothers in Chicago and other cities of the United States. He sacrificed his whole country in behalf of "party solidarity!" [Applause on the Democratic side.] Ah, gentlemen, when you talk of prosperity in the South and read Christmas carols and New Year's greetings in order to prove it, you are reckoning without your hosts. You avowed to the American people you would lower the tariff; that you would take the burdens from their backs. You have failed to do it, and if there is anything significant in the protests of the American people the next election will witness an avalanche of Democratic triumphs. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Where have you helped the farmer in your Payne-Aldrich bill? You put his cotton on the free list. You taxed him on bagging and ties. And you refused to lower the woolen schedule. You raised the cotton schedule by reclassification and in other ways more than 10 per cent. You raised the duty on lumber and building material, taking into consideration the maximum and minimum rates. When he asked you for free iron ore, you taxed it with a prohibitory duty in behalf of the American steel trust. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Judge Gary, their agent here and elsewhere, admitted against interest before the Ways and Means Committee:

If you remove the duty from iron ore alone and it remains so, no doubt that would protect the people here, who will in the future have to buy their ore against possible oppression on the part of our corporation.

The gentleman from Illinois undoubtedly heard that solemn declaration before his committee.

The new humorist of the Republican party, Mr. BOUTELL, said that he would not claim that the Payne-Aldrich bill had brought "additional prosperity" to the country. No; he could not make such claims. Because when you say to the laboring men that it has done so, they would reply that "in twelve years our wages have not increased 20 per cent, and the cost of living has been augmented more than 60 per cent under the Dingley and Payne bills."

WHEREIN YOU HAVE FAILED TO LIGHTEN THE FARMERS' BURDENS AND HAVE PILED THEM HIGHER THAN EVER.

Pray, how have you helped the southern farmer by this bill, or the agriculturists anywhere? You are challenged to specify. Under its provisions the increased cost of clothing to men and boys in the year 1910 will amount to almost $150,000,000. Considering the maximum and minimum duty, the price of lumber is increased more than 50 per cent. You tax the cheapest woolen blankets more than 100 per cent. You raised the tax on cotton stockings and greatly increased their price. Structural steel and products of iron, already outrageously protected, you increased and advanced their prices. Since you passed your tariff law the prices of clothing have increased 25 per cent. Living expenses are admittedly higher now by 60 per cent than twelve years ago, and yet you prate about this being prosperity. The wages of those who labor have increased barely 20 per cent, and yet they must spend three times more than that amount to live and provide for their families. If this be increased prosperity, deliver us from it!

The gentleman from Illinois said the woolen schedule had only been slightly changed in two respects, and yet the American people have determined that it was too high, and the President declared it to be so. When the bill passed through the House, although you promised a downward revision, you raised the schedules 1.56 per cent, and the Senate raised these schedules more than 6 per cent above the Dingley rates. And yet you had frequently promised downward revision. You decreased 6 per cent of the schedules and left untouched 80 per cent of the Dingley schedules. You call that a downward revision and a relief for the American farmer!

Ah, gentlemen, in the last extremes, when the bill went to conference, the President threw himself into the breach. The President, the conferees, and the Senate were engaged in a bitter struggle for weeks. The President came to the rescue of the American people and declared that the Senate rates must be lowered, and finally they were lowered in some slight respects. The American press said that President Taft had achieved a great victory. What was it?

THE THRILLING STORY OF THE PRESIDENT'S CONTEST WHILE THE BILL WAS IN CONFERENCE.

From day to day history was made by the conferees and recorded by the press. Let me recite some of it by exhibiting the record as published by some of the papers. It is startling, edifying, and interesting. Here it is:

For four months the people here have been witnessing an exhibition at Washington of a party trying to enact a tariff bill in flat violation of its pledges to the people. If the final result shall be a law of that kind, the next election shall see the tariff the chief issue. (Governor Fort, of New Jersey, in Washington Post, July 16, 1909.)

In the Washington Post, July 17, 1909, we find:

Smilingly President Taft told a delegation of 22 Republican Congressmen and 1 Protectionist Democrat, who called on him yesterday in the interests of duties on raw materials, that he would insist upon a downward revision of the tariff according to the pledges given to the people by the Republican party.

Again, Washington Post, July 17, 1909:

The President repeated the platform of the Republican party, and said that he had always understood that it meant a downward revision in many instances, though, perhaps, in some few instances an increase might be needed.

* * * * * * *

He said he felt that his position as the titular head of the Republican party and as President, with the whole people as his constituency, gave him a somewhat broader point of view than that of a single Member of Congress in respect to articles produced in his district. He felt strongly the call of the country for a downward revision within the limitations of the protective principle, and he hoped to be able to respond to that call as he heard it, as well in the interests of the party as of the country. (From a statement issued at the White House dated July 16.)

All the above occurred at the famous White House dinner.

The President asserts for the first time his authority as titular head of his party. As such, he announces his conviction that the party platform meant a downward revision and that no other interpretation could be placed upon it.

This is the comment of the Washington Post.

Again, in Washington Post of July 18, 1909, we find:

TAFT TO WIN FIGHT.

President Taft will win his fight for downward revision of the tariff. * * * This was admitted by a majority of the conferees on the tariff bill yesterday.

And here is another most engaging item in the Washington Post of July 25, 1909:

The indications are that the President, backed by the House, is gradually gaining ground in his fight against the Senate for the downward revision which he demands. That this defeat is a bitter pill for the Senate goes without saying, since it has become almost a tradition for the Senate to frame the tariff laws of the country.

And still refreshing news came through the Washington Post of July 30, 1909:

Conferees agree; victory for Taft. President forces action. Sends letter to committee chamber in morning reiterating his demand for $1.25 rate on lumber and the adoption of the Senate schedule on gloves. Polite inference of veto if wishes are ignored causes consternation, and results in speedy adjustment of differences.

What a glorious privilege it would be to see that "presidential letter, dated July 29, 1909." Will not our humorist friend now secure its publication? He at last reduced the schedules as made by the Senate and did not reduce those of the Dingley bill. And when the conference was over, when this great victory was heralded to the world, the average schedules of the Payne bill were 1.71 per cent higher than the Dingley rates. So the President failed, reducing neither the Dingley nor Payne rates.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Does the gentleman rest his case that the Payne law has increased the duties over the Dingley law on the fact that the average ad valorem is higher?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I could rest it on that, but I will rest it on a firmer foundation from the gentleman's standpoint, which is that the President of the United States says the rates were too high, but he had to sacrifice them on account of "party solidarity."

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio does not think rates are too high generally. I stand in this presence and say that the Payne rates are excessive, and, thank God, I also voted to reduce the Dingley rates, which course the people expected your party to also pursue.

Mr. Chairman, there is no middle ground, from my standpoint, on this tariff question. Tariff imports can be levied for two purposes—one for the purpose of protecting private individuals and the other for the purpose of raising revenue for the Government. There is no compromise zone on principle. To levy duties for the purpose of revenue is justifiable; to lay them for the purpose of enriching individuals is no less than robbery, even though it be done under the guise of law. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

THE PROCESSES AND FASHION IN WHICH THE BILL WAS MADE.

It is interesting to know how the tariff act was framed and brought into existence. I will call a high Republican authority and permit him to give expert testimony. He is a lifelong member of that party. His indictment and narrative run:

Our House of Lords is not made up of landlords, but of steel lords, woolen lords, cotton lords, lumber lords, and, as the latest creation, zinc lords. The amount of taxes and bounties on steel, woolen and cotton goods, lumber, and zinc is determined for us, not by a responsible ministry as in England, but by these lords, through the influence they can exert on individual Members of Congress; still more through the pressure they bring to bear on Senate and House committees; and most of all by their power to dictate terms to the committee of conference which, subject to the votes of their colleagues and the presidential veto, practically determines what the tariff shall be.

Again, with startling interest, this same author asserts:

For instance, when the President sent his demand for a reduction on lumber to the recent committee of conference, Mr. Aldrich announced that, if that was an ultimatum, the whole bill was at an end; the conference did nothing for six hours, until one of the conferees on the part of the House, himself a lumber man, went out and labored with the representatives of the lumber interests, induced them to withdraw their claims, and reported their concession to the conference committee; whereupon Mr. Aldrich said, "Of course, if they yield, we yield;" and so, by grace of these lumber lords, we pay the Aldrich-Payne rather than the Dingley rates of tax and bounty on all sorts of things.

This is from the pen of Dr. W. De Witt Hyde, president of Bowdoin College, in the Outlook.

Mr. Chairman, old Noah sent out from the ark a dove to make a valuable and pertinent inquiry. That scriptural dove returned with an olive branch. They had timber schedules then. When the conference committee understood that the lumber interests would not yield, they sent out another dove of peace, our colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], who induced the timber interests by "cooing"——

Mr. JAMES. And wooing.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes; as my friend from Kentucky says, and by "wooing," and persuading, induced them to agree to a reduction. Then he came back and said the lumber interests had slightly succumbed to his protestations after the conference had been waiting six hours, that the rates on lumber might be reduced with their permission. Then the gentleman from Rhode Island said, "Of course, if they yield, we yield." [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.]

And then the dove flew away to tall timber on the dry land. Mr. Chairman, if the lumber lords had not yielded, if the dove of peace from Michigan had not gone forth, we would have had no Payne-Aldrich bill to-day. And it would have been far better for the American people if we had not. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I am sorry the dove ever returned from that first fatal flight. I wish he had followed the example of that ancient dove on the second exodus from the ark.

Mr. BOUTELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTELL. The children and all of the other people in my district to whom the gentleman refers are very much interested in the price of eatables. One of the most nourishing things we have in the world is rice. May I ask if the gentleman from Texas is in favor of the immediate repeal of the duty on rice?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the immediate repeal of all protective duties in the bill. [Applause and laughter on the Democratic side.] God knows, if it will bring relief to those suffering children, I will agree to repeal any protective duty and let them have rice.

Mr. BOUTELL. Now, let me ask the gentleman one other question that I did not get an answer to, and that is this, Is the gentleman also in favor of the repeal of the duty on cattle?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. I am in favor of the repeal of every protective duty in that bill. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I will say to the gentleman now that we have no protective party in Texas. We are a Democratic party. We stand for a tariff for revenue. And if my people expected me to vote for protectionism in any form, I would return my commission rather than depart from Democratic faith. [Applause on the Democratic side.] In no form does a protective duty commend itself to me.

Now, let me ask the gentleman a question: Is he in favor of the repeal of the duty on woolen goods, on wheat, on cotton goods, and meat, and oats, and barley——

Mr. BOUTELL. I was in favor of placing cattle and most agricultural products on the free list in committee.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Then, if you will, I pledge you the Democrats will join you and put those things on the free list. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Now, how about sugar? Would you repeal the duty on sugar?

Mr. JAMES. Answer.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And in order to help you, I will vote to put sugar on the free list to-morrow.

Mr. BOUTELL. How would the gentleman raise the sixty millions of revenue?

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Oh, tell me about sugar. It is a sweet subject and the gentleman is a sweet singer.

Mr. BOUTELL. How would you raise the sixty millions of revenue?

Mr. HENRY of Texas and several Members on the Democratic side. By an income tax!

Mr. HENRY of Texas. And revenue tariffs and corporation and special excise taxes. [Applause on the Democratic side.] How does the gentleman stand on the income tax?

Mr. BOUTELL. I am opposed to the income tax. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] I stand with Thomas Jefferson on the income tax. [Applause on the Republican side.] He was the father of the Democratic party.

Mr. HENRY of Texas. How do you stand on the corporation tax?

Several MEMBERS on the Democratic side. Answer! Answer! [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HENRY of Texas. Ah, the gentleman sits and solemnly fails to respond in this presence how he stands on the corporation tax! Ah, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] stands pat, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] is now willing to repeal some duties, but none that will help the consumer. He was kind enough to say he would go to my district and help me if I had no Republican opponent, but after his admission to-day it can not be possible for his district to return him to Congress without a Democratic opponent. [Applause on the Democratic side.] He will say to those children, to those laborers walking the streets and crying for bread and asking for employment, that he is opposed to an income tax, that these rates are not too high. His district will make answer. Let me say to him that my party believes the wealth of the country ought to bear its just proportion of taxes, and the American people will yet pass an income-tax law. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Chairman, I regret I have not more time to devote to this subject, but I have thrown out a few observations that may perhaps be of some benefit to the gentleman from Illinois and the gentleman from Ohio. [Applause on the Democratic side.] And permit me to again remind them that the American people demanded a fair revision. You have utterly failed to give it to them. But when November comes, as indicated by the signal guns in Missouri the other day, the Republican party and the "gates of hell" shall not prevail against the righteous indignation of the American consumers. Ah, you ask where the groaning comes in. Let me recite the story. The people agitated and won a verdict for revision of the Dingley rates below those written in that law in 1897. You assembled here last March and ignored the verdict. Those rates had proved to be far too high, and living had constantly increased. On cotton manufactures the rates exceeded 53 per cent. You increased them more than 10 per cent in the Payne-Aldrich bill. The woolen schedules exceeding 59 per cent and admitted to be exorbitant, you refused to change. They should have been reduced 40 per cent and more. The steel and iron schedules should have been cut from their exorbitant basis more than 50 per cent, and many articles covered therein placed on the free list. Lumber should have gone on the free list. And so with iron ore, bagging and ties, agricultural implements, and everything competing with a trust-controlled article. You are challenged to show where you have lightened the burden of the American farmer and consumer. You make his cotton free and tax him to death on lumber, his plows, implements, cutlery, clothes, hats, shoes, socks, furniture, cooking utensils, building material, glassware, hearses, coffins, and practically everything he eats, wears, and needs from the cradle to the grave.

You have ground the 40 per cent of our population living in the country into the very dust for the benefit of a few. Many have been forced to abandon their calling on the farms by your increased cost of living to seek more remunerative employment in the business centers. In other days more than 90 per cent of our people lived in the rural precincts, and their calling was more profitable. They have borne your burdens patiently, but they will turn and retrieve their wonted prestige. It is true the farmer is getting fairly good prices at the farm now, but the extortion and charges almost akin to robbery prevailing throughout America are fixed by monopoly, trusts, and other dealers after the products have left the farmer. Ah, Mr. Speaker, the issue is at hand, the hour has struck, and the American toilers and consumers are demanding a fulfillment of seductive avowals. Imbued with conscientious regard for the rights of property and honestly accumulated wealth, I enlist here now under the flag of those marching to certain and permanent victory, vindicating the imperishable principle of absolute equality under just and humane laws. [Loud and continued applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL].

Mr. BOUTELL. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the other day in speaking in the House I had occasion to call attention to some applause from the Democratic side which punctuated certain references in my remarks, and I asked why it was that Democrats in the mass always applauded a reference to misery or misfortune. Again I ask that question to-day, Why it is that Democrats in the aggregate, in their political capacity, always applaud a reference to misery, misfortune, or disaster, and why is it, Mr. Chairman, that they are louder and more tempestuous in their applause the older and more incorrect the tale of suffering and disaster is? [Applause on the Republican side.] But, Mr. Chairman, the Democrats of the House exceeded all their previous records in this line to-day. Some of you gentlemen are fathers and some of you, I know, are grandfathers. You can go from this session of the House to-day with a new tale to your wives and children. You can gather them about you, and you can say: "Ah, but we had a grand old Democratic time in the House to-day. Oh, it was splendid; it would have done your hearts good, you mothers and little children, to have been there.

"The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] raked up an old report of the school board of Chicago, two years old, at a time when the city was suffering from the panic of 1907, and he read a statement to the effect that little children, little, helpless, suffering children in that city had to go to school hungry, and we received that with tempestuous applause, the more impetuous of us pounding on our desks and stamping our feet. Oh, my wife and children, was not that a glorious time for the grand old Democratic party?" [Applause on the Republican side.] "And when he got the number of suffering children up into the thousands we applauded still louder, and when he got the tale of suffering two years old into the tens of thousands, our men went wild and jumping mad with glee. Oh, my wife and children, it was a glorious occasion, a triumphant occasion for the party of misfortune, distress, and national disaster." [Applause on the Republican side.]

So much for that phase of the gentleman's discussion of the Payne tariff. In all the large cities we have, as the Good Book says, the poor always with us. There is where the glorious rural districts of Texas are ahead of the great cities. But we do our best to take care of them, and the condition of some two years ago, as I said when we were discussing this matter the other day, does not exist at the present time.

Furthermore, the gentleman from Texas, if he had been familiar with some of my public utterances—some of them, I am glad and proud to say, given before a great educational institution in the South—if he had been familiar with some of my public articles, with some of my addresses in the city of Chicago, he would have known my views about the treatment of children in the public school. He could have mentioned my suggestion to the school boards of the great cities of the country, and I will give it to him now for the benefit of the large cities that are going to grow up in his splendid State. It is this—and in dealing with public schools I push aside absolutely the objection that anything that we can do for the welfare of the children is in the nature of paternalism:

I say children in public schools, whether they are the children of millionaires or the children of paupers, are just like canary birds—they are always restless and they are always hungry—and in no public school ought a child to be either cold, thirsty, or hungry. Just as you would put a furnace in a school, just as you would put a water cooler in a school, so in every schoolhouse in every city of the world there should stand convenient for all a cooler of pasteurized milk and a barrel of crackers, so that every child could help himself freely. These are my personal views of our duty toward children in the public schools. I hope they will meet the approval of my friend from Texas when those large cities grow up in his State, as they surely will, but do not attempt to make the Payne tariff that was passed six months ago responsible for conditions that prevailed two years ago.

Mr. AUSTIN. I wish to ask the gentleman from Illinois if it is not a fact that the English Parliament four years ago passed a law giving the municipal authorities permission to use public funds out of which to feed school children in free-trade Great Britain?

Mr. BOUTELL. Oh, yes; and not only that, but in a great many other cities of the world hungry children are taken care of in this way. But to say that there are any hungry children now, anywhere in this country, owing to any national legislation is of course pure moonshine. It is simply idle talk for possible political advantage.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to something which I refer to with considerable hesitancy.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. I prefer not to yield at this time.

Mr. HARDY. I just want to ask——

Mr. BOUTELL. I must decline to yield until I have answered the gentleman from Texas to some extent; then if time is granted to me I will yield to any extent to gentlemen of the minority.

As I was saying, I shall now have to refer to a matter which I allude to with considerable hesitancy, because gentlemen on the other side of the aisle from the South know the feelings I have regarding that section; with what pride and joy and satisfaction I have looked upon the developments that have taken place in that part of the country under Republican policies. When I spoke in reply to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] the other day I wanted to adopt the simplest form of common-law pleading; and if we had a judge here—if we could refer it to my friend from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the leader of the minority, as a judge—I would like to have him decide as to whether in the argument of the gentleman from Texas the pleadings have been adhered to. In brief, the pleadings are: The gentleman from Texas said that the whole country was groaning under the burdens of the Payne law. That is his declaration. Here is my answer: The whole country is not groaning under the burdens of the Payne law. The part of the country that the gentleman from Texas knows most about is his own district and his own State. The eleventh district of Texas and the State of Texas are not groaning under the Payne law, because they are not groaning at all. Now the gentleman from Texas admits that there is no groaning in his State, but he asserts that the Payne tariff, passed in 1909, is now causing distress in my city because children went to school hungry in 1908. I submit that this is not good pleading.

I think it was abundantly proved by the papers published in the strongholds of Democracy and in articles from a great southern nonpolitical trade journal that nobody is groaning in Texas on account of the Payne tariff. But I was interrupted in the course of my remarks ten days ago by my friend from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS], now sitting in the front row of the minority, who, when time was yielded to him by me during my remarks, stated that the prosperity in Texas was not caused by the Payne law. I did not say that it was. That it was not caused by Republican legislation. I did not say that it was. I had simply traversed the statement of the gentleman from the eleventh district that there was groaning in his State. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] said that the prosperity there was in spite of Republican legislation, and it was due to the fact that Texas had had a Democratic state government since 1872, and that that was the cause of its prosperity. That I must now dispute and give my proof.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman permit me? We had had Republican adversity from 1866 to 1872, and groaned under it, and that we had grown since that time and prospered more than any other State of the Union.

Mr. BOUTELL. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] made that statement on the former occasion I held in my hand proof to the contrary. I refrained from using it. I have it in my hand to-day, and I will give to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. STEPHENS] and to the gentleman from the eleventh district an opportunity now to withdraw their statements and expunge them altogether from the RECORD that Texas was always prosperous under a Democratic state government, and that its prosperity was due to that Democratic state administration.

If the gentlemen do not care to withdraw that statement, they compel me to answer it. I will prove by the governor of Texas that in 1895, two years after a Democratic national administration had been elected to cooperate with the Democratic state administration that had been carrying on the affairs of Texas for twenty-three years, the school fund of the State of Texas was bankrupt, and that the general fund of the treasury was empty. Do you wish me to go into the details, or will you now withdraw your statement?

I hold in my hand the remarks made by Speaker T. S. Smith, of the house of representatives of the Texas legislature, on January 8, 1895, just two years after the inauguration of Cleveland and disaster: [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

In my judgment we are confronted with the gravest conditions and the heaviest responsibilities that have been before the legislature of this State in many years.

What did those ominous words presage? I now read from the annual message of Hon. C. A. CULBERSON of January 16, 1895, a man whose word no one in Texas would gainsay:

The indebtedness due the State on the available school fund and the general revenue has grown to such proportions as to necessitate vigorous efforts to collect it. It is also absolutely essential to reform existing methods of collection and, wherever just and advisable, to resort to new sources of taxation and revenues. The duty which confronts the legislature upon these measures is urgent and imperative.

Among the elements of the permanent school fund are $15,000,000 in land notes, and the interest on them, together with leases of school lands, are principal sources of the available fund out of which the schools are supported. During the past few years, partly from inefficient collection agencies and partly from financial depression, arrears of interest have so greatly increased that the state treasurer on August 21, 1894, estimated the total deficiency in interest and leases on August 31, 1895, less forfeitures on land sales for 1887, at $761,889.25 and the comptroller at $956,889.25. The treasurer now estimates this deficiency at $1,000,000 on January 1, 1895.

In addition to the unpaid interest there is due the school fund, excluding the insolvent list, $222,196.17 for delinquent school taxes from 1873 to 1886, and the sum of $174,070.88 from 1886 to 1893, inclusive, aggregating $396,228.82, less uncertain and inconsiderable amounts paid in redemption of land sold for taxes for these years.

The delinquencies in the general fund are especially significant—

Listen to this my friends. This is especially significant:

From 1873 to 1886—

Years in which the Democrats were in complete control of the State—

From 1873 to 1886, excluding the insolvent list, taxes were unpaid amounting to $301,845.46, and from 1886 to 1893, inclusive, the sum of $230,531.55, aggregating $532,127.03, less receipts in redemption of property, $201,890.46, leaving the net delinquency $330,236.57. A small portion of the redemption receipts represents payments for school purposes, but the total of all taxes is the same and the several items approximately accurate. The delinquent poll list from 1886 to 1893, reported insolvent, is $1,826,302.79. From this statement it will be seen that the total delinquent tax lists, including ad valorem, school, and poll, reaches the extraordinary sum of $2,052,765.88.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE PUBLIC SCHOOL.

For the year 1893–94 there was a deficit of $606,018.45 in the apportionment, which has not been paid, but which, with a subsequent deficit, amounted on August 31, 1894, to $659,468.50.

How about the general fund?

THE GENERAL FUND.

The condition of the treasury as to the general revenue is also exceedingly embarrassing. In May last it appeared that there was an excess of expenses over the receipts for the year ending August 31, 1893, amounting to $302,837.41. In September it was estimated by the comptroller that the receipts from all sources for the year ending February 28, 1895, would be $2,125,000, which added to $47,693.05 cash in the treasury aggregated $2,172,693.05. The disbursements for that year were estimated at $2,300,000, making a deficit of $127,306.95, which added to the estimated deficiency in appropriations of $200,000 created a deficit of $327,306.95. The situation now, as reported by the comptroller, is far more serious.

I would call the attention of the gentleman from the eleventh district [Mr. HENRY of Texas] to this:

Instead of a deficiency of $327,306.95 it is $768,329.48. In his report for 1894 the comptroller shows that on August 31, 1894, there was a cash balance in the treasury of $38,443.85, and outstanding registered warrants amounting to $430,993.57. This cash balance was called "absorbed warrants," not included in the registered warrants mentioned, and consequently at the time named the treasury was empty, and there was an outstanding registered indebtedness of $430,443.85. On the 14th of this month the treasurer reported that this outstanding registered indebtedness had increased to $573,015.34. In addition to this the comptroller reports that for the past year there were registered and estimated deficiencies amounting to $195,314.14, which made the total indebtedness on January 14 $768,329.48, as above stated, with no balance in the treasury to general revenue. It is also shown by this officer that the appropriations asked for by the heads of departments, state institutions, judiciary, etc., for the two years beginning March 1, 1895, aggregate $5,251,085.40, while the net receipts under present tax rate and laws are estimated at $3,863,359.50. If the legislature should make the appropriation asked, there would be a deficit of $1,387,725.90 for the two years besides that now existing, and would require the tax rate to be raised to 30 cents for the year 1895 and 25 cents for the year 1896.

That, gentlemen of the committee, is the actual situation in the State of Texas, after twenty-three years of continuous Democratic administration of the state affairs, and after two years of Democratic administration under the last Democratic President.

Mr. Chairman, I would not have alluded to this past history of the State of Texas under Democratic national and state administrations if I had not been forced to do so by Representatives from that State and if there was not a more cheerful sequel to the story. I believe in looking for the bright things of life. I believe in looking for those things which benefit and help mankind, and I will read now from the message read in the house of representatives of the Texas legislature in 1901, by Governor Joseph D. Sayres, four years after Cleveland and disaster had been supplanted by McKinley and prosperity. [Applause on the Republican side.] And it tells a different story in the State of Texas. It shows what could be effected by national policies, which could not be done by the state administration.

In his message read in the house of representatives of the Texas legislature on January 8, 1901, Governor Joseph D. Sayres said:

It is indeed gratifying that you have convened under circumstances so auspicious.

Excepting not more than 15 of the 243 counties—organized and unorganized—into which the State is divided, prosperity prevails in them all to an extent not exceeded in any year of their history.

Abundant crops, with a remunerative market, have well rewarded the husbandman, and never before has the demand for labor—skilled and unskilled—been so great and universal or the compensation of wage-earners more satisfactory.

The cattle and sheep industries are prosperous, railway construction has been actively renewed, and manufacturing enterprises of many kinds are being inaugurated.

Money has become more plentiful and its circulation more general, resulting in a marked decline of the interest rate.

A desirable immigration is being attracted in large numbers through the healthfulness of our climate, the fertility and freshness of our lands, and the many opportunities that here await industry, economy, and thrift.

The resources of the State in all their variety, wealth, and abundance are unknown even to ourselves, but with the continuance of present conditions—

Namely, a Republican tariff and a single gold standard—

Though for a few years only, and with a prudent and conservative administration of the public affairs, such development may be safely anticipated as will not disappoint the most sanguine expectations.

Gentlemen, we gave that permanency of affairs, and the expectations have not been disappointing.

With the construction of the Isthmian Canal—

Not a Democratic state policy—

nothing except inexcusable folly in matter of government will prevent this Commonwealth taking within the next two decades the foremost place among the States of the American Union.

It will also be gratifying to know that the administration of the state government has, during the past two years, given to the people the best service possible.

That was after four years of Republican national administration, undoing what twenty-three years of Democratic administration had brought about, an insolvent school fund and an empty treasury. [Applause on the Republican side.]

We come down four years later. Now, let me read some inspiring words uttered in Texas on the 10th day of January, 1905, by the Hon. H. P. Breisford, of Eastland County, nominating F. W. Seabury, of Starr County, for speaker of the house. Remember the date, 1905, after eight years of the Dingley tariff law and the financial bank act of March 14, 1900:

Present conditions do not demand, will not permit, legislative convulsion.

The great cattle industry of northwest and west and southwest Texas sturdily stemming the current of depressed values; the planters and farmers of the black and red and sandy lands whose good sense at last has checkered the wide spread of the cotton fields with truck patches and alfalfa and corn; the great railroad interests of Texas, with a total mileage now greater than any other State; our banks and trust companies, whose vaults are teeming with dollars not borrowed from the North and East, but the savings of a prosperous people; all of these great factors in the prosperity of grand new Texas sends to us a message set to the new music of whirling looms and spindles and ringing hammers and the clanking machinery of new factories, and the message is: "Let us have peace."

[Applause on the Republican side.]

I did not suppose there were any standpatters in Texas five years ago. [Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

A prosperous people is a conservative people, and when Texas struck a balance sheet at the end of the year just gone her people found reason for exultation.

No one who has lived in Texas long enough to become acclimated has doubted the almost illimitable wealth of her resources or has failed to note the steady and resistless trend toward her destiny as queen regent in the imperial sisterhood of States.

I think, gentlemen, I have brought the story of prosperity in Texas down to the present day in the extracts I read in the House a little over a week ago. A Democratic state administration for twenty-three years brought Texas just to the verge of bankruptcy in 1893. A national Democratic administration for two years pushed Texas right over the verge in 1895 until she was toppling in irretrievable financial panic, and the Republican party brought her back to prosperity. And what the Republican party did for Texas she did for the entire South. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, the turn given to this debate by the gentleman from Texas compels me to perform a still more painful task. I must appeal from the Democratic statesman to the Democratic man of business; from the Texas politician to the Texas man of business.

During the last campaign I met a gentleman from Texas with whom I discussed many of these conditions, and I naturally said to him as we got more or less intimate, "How are you going to vote down in Texas this year?"

Oh, well—

He said—

you are touching now on a rather delicate subject, but I will say this much to you, when we vote, of course we vote the Democratic ticket, but we pray that the Republicans will win.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

That was the sentiment of a Texas business man.

Now I am going to make an appeal from the Texas statesman to the Texas man of business. I hold in my hand a printed copy of a speech entitled "Texas prosperity," an address delivered by J. O. Terrell, of San Antonio, before the national meeting of the Commercial Secretaries' Association at San Antonio, Tex., December 10, 1909, and on the fly leaf of this pamphlet, which is one of the most interesting I have read for many months, is this sentiment in quotation marks:

The land that produces and sells raw materials is rarely prosperous or happy.

After an eloquent allusion to prosperity, I come to this language on the second page—and let me say that this speech is so good I am going to put it all in the RECORD; but I must read a few paragraphs now to show the difference between the opinions of the southern man of business and the southern statesman, between the Texas man of business and the Texas statesman:

Texas surpasses all of her sister States in the production of cotton, rice, cattle, and demagogues.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Her cotton is largely shipped to other lands, where it is manufactured and sold by the purchasers at a great profit. Her cattle and rice feed the world. Her demagogues are reserved solely for home consumption, and appear to be as useless and prolific as the house fly.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Let me say before I go any further that I want to absolve every Member of the Texas delegation in this House from any criticism in this address. I want to take literally what the author says about Texas demagogues, that they are reserved exclusively for home consumption, and that they do not come as Members from Texas to this House. [Laughter and applause.]

There is no demand for them anywhere, because all lands are overstocked, and human thought stands appalled at an effort to ascertain a reason for their existence.

Some one has said that the demagogue was created to make the world humble, because he always endeavored to keep it dissatisfied.

He is found in every community, and whatever be his fault he can not be accused of a lack of industry. Everywhere he is constantly telling the people that they are being cruelly robbed, that they are absolutely at the mercy of more favored sections, that their rulers are corrupt, that government is a farce, and that justice has no temple on the earth.

He has thus talked so often and so long to the people of Texas that in many places he has become enthroned as a deity, worshipped as a statesman, and loved as a patriot. Whole communities listen with bated breath when he speaks, and admiring parents point him out to their children as the lofty spirit who constantly shields them from the oppression of the world. It goes so far that many of our people believe that they are in danger of becoming white slaves, and some of them actually glory in the faith that they are downtrodden and oppressed. There used to be an old man in eastern Texas who, when one inquired how he was getting along, always answered, "Poorly, poorly, thank God."

[Laughter.]

It is really strange that our people listen to the demagogue, but they do. It is stranger still that they elect him to office, but they do. It seems clear that they prefer to be told of their misfortunes than to be told of their faults. The demagogue tells them that they have no faults but many misfortunes, and they believe him. He weeps with them and they vote for him. He tells them that the corporations are thirsting for his blood and they fly to arms in his defense. They do not seem to realize that he is an 18-karat fraud, and 16-to-1 hypocrite, and that he is the most expensive nuisance that ever beset a State.

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

He has cost Texas more money than all the tariff sheets ever invented.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

He has done her more damage than all the armies that ever marched against her, but "with all his faults she loves him still."

[Laughter and applause.]

I assert to-day that Texas is, in climate, soil, and productiveness, the "Garden of the Lord," and that if in any particular she is behind any sister State the cause of the default is in her laws or in the demagogues who make or execute them.

So much for a Texas business man's opinion of what a Democratic state administration is doing for Texas. Then he goes on to enter into the reasons why Texas is not even more prosperous than she is, that more money of the country should be invested in cotton factories and other industries. Then he says:

We sell cows and buy butter. We sell steers and buy beef. We sell fruit and buy preserves. We sell hides and buy leather. We sell wool and buy blankets. We sell cotton and buy calico, and then we stand up like brave men and cuss old man ALDRICH and the little State of Rhode Island.

[Applause and laughter on the Republican side.]

Would that we could sell a great many demagogues and buy a few statesmen. To be plain about it, I would like to purchase ALDRICH himself and keep him down here a few years.

[Applause on the Republican side.]

I believe it would be a great investment. He would certainly turn things upside down. I would enjoy hearing those New England "Yankees" groaning and complaining that the South was getting all their money.

Gentlemen, do you wonder that the South is dissatisfied? Are you surprised when you hear complaints? Do you wonder that her newspapers are constantly telling of her woes? Whose is the fault? Where is the cause, and where is the cure? Can the conditions be reversed by constantly abusing the northern manufacturers? We have tried that plan for more than a quarter of a century and our hearts are weary.

Can hope come from special laws intended to benefit our farmers? Our statutes are reeking to-day with such legislation. Even as discontented a man as Mr. D. J. Neill, the late president of the Farmers' Union, declared over his signature last year that "the farmers of Texas have no cause to complain of the government of Texas."

Can it come from political conventions, from silver-tongued orators, from high-sounding platform declarations? Alas, we have already had more of those things than any other land under the sun.

Can we reach it by abusing the trusts? The trusts care but little how we abuse them so long as we continue to buy from them. Has anyone quit buying from them? We will not permit them to do business in Texas, but we send them our dollars just the same. If we had a few trusts ourselves, they might worry the people of some other State, but they would bring their money here. They would create a balance of trade in our favor. I have noticed few complaints of the trusts from the States in which they are situated. An old farmer friend once declared to me in a confidential way that most of his troubles arose from the fact that he paid more for the things he bought than he received from the things he sold. He seemed surprised when I told him that much of the trouble of the world arose from the same cause. That is the ailment of Texas to-day.

And yet the case is plain and the remedy is easy. Build factories in the Southern States. Do not wait for a new generation; build them now. Let their smoke arise like incense; let them double and treble the value of our raw materials, and let the money of the South remain at home. Do you know why this was not done long ago? I answer, the demagogue. Demagogues and factories do not flourish in the same soil.

[Laughter and applause on the Republican side.]

Then he goes on to give a business view of how the laws could be framed in Texas so as not to drive away investments from the State. He then proceeds:

All this time, however, you could console yourself by listening to the silvery voice of the demagogue crying, "Hurrah for grand old Texas! Hurrah for the people! Down with the trusts! No corporation can ever fasten its fetters on grand old Texas."

Yes; we give great encouragement to manufacturing plants to locate somewhere else, and they generally do it.

The trouble with many of our laws is that they do not help, but hinder. By keeping the manufacturer away they lessen the farmer's profits, but our national resources are so great that he can probably survive the loss. The serious point is that it teaches him bad morals. One great fundamental truth should guide all legislation. It is, that while grass grows and water runs, we should have the same laws for all classes of men. No logic can evade this sublime declaration. It is unanswerable, because it is right. It was right in the "morning of the world." It was right when Mary's Son walked beneath the bending palms of Palestine. It is right to-day.

When we turn from it we begin to pass laws to please the majority and to injure the minority. We begin to quote that pernicious phrase about giving the "greatest good to the greatest number." We begin to forget that statesmanship in every age has found its noblest duty in the protection of the few from the rapacity of the many.

Once started on this line we know not where to stop. Sometimes we endeavor to pass laws that will permit us to do things which they forbid in others. Sometimes we realize that such laws might be unconstitutional, and then we pass them to apply to all, but only enforce them against others. Of this condition it can only be said that it sears the conscience of any people who permit its existence.

Take, for illustration, the present trust laws in Texas. Are they being enforced against farmers? You read almost weekly of great meetings that fix the price—

Of what, Mr. Chairman—

You read almost weekly of great meetings that fix the price of cotton and cotton seed at abnormal prices. Do you read of any indictments against the men who fix the prices? Do you hear of any of the young gentlemen in the Attorney-General's office traveling over the State and endeavoring to stop the fixing? Never! These young gentlemen are traveling over other States searching for evidence to convict other people from putting up prices on things we buy. They appear to think that it is entirely proper to combine and put up prices on the things we have to sell. Do you think it is virtuous to put up the price of cotton seed and a crime to put up the price of oil? Do you think that it can be commendable to agree to put up the price of wheat and a sin to agree to put up the price of lard when both of them go into the same biscuit? If you think so, you need a new conscience. People of Texas, such laws injure you more than anyone else. It is true that you may occasionally put a little money in your treasury by such practices. You may take a million or so from an oil company and rob its stockholders of their property. You may fine the manufacturers of machinery and drive them from your State. You may collect a few dollars now and then from various business men who attempt to do what you are doing, but you can not repeal that sublime text: "Whatsoever you would that men should do unto you, do you even so unto them."

It does not pay to be unfair. Leaving aside all questions of morality and justice, it does not pay even from a monetary point of view. Kerosene oil furnishes light for the farmer's home. Do you think it will go down in price when the Waters-Pierce Company is finally dismantled? You are still buying harvesting machinery. Has the price gone down? You are still buying all sorts of manufactured articles. Have your servants at Austin reduced prices upon them? Do not you really think it would be better business sense to bring the manufactories down here, take a little stock in them, sell them some supplies, and make money in fair trade with them, instead of continually persecuting them for doing exactly what you are doing? Do you realize that if they were here our money would be kept at home and that you would occasionally see some of it a second time? What good are our state antitrust laws doing? I will give any one of you a week to answer that question, and it will then remain unanswered. Now, do you know what would happen if they were repealed?

First. Men from everywhere would hasten to put their money in manufacturing plants in Texas.

Second. The personal wealth of the State would double in five years.

Third. The prices we are paying for manufactured articles would be promptly and greatly reduced.

But what would then become of the demagogue? All the old issues are frozen stiff. What would he talk about if the trust issue should go like greenbackism, free silverism, and all the others isms have gone? Perhaps he could still appeal to the "man in the forks of the creek." The fork dweller has become quite a character in our politics. Frequently he lives on the hills, but for campaign purposes we always locate him at the forks. He is supposed to be absolutely impervious to reason. He is the old guard in the battalions of ignorance. The demagogue is the only connection he has with the world. He believes what the demagogue tells him, because his ears have heard no other sound.

The periods of the orator, the tables of the statistician, the wit of the essayist, have no more effect upon him than has the dew upon the pyramids. Perhaps if the trust issue were buried the demagogue could talk to him about the public-school system of Texas, for the poor fellow actually believes that Texas has a good public-school system. This is the most cruel delusion that the demagogue has fastened upon him. I believe I will demolish it here, because there can be no real prosperity anywhere without educating childhood. Texas has a fair public-school system in all of her cities, in some of her towns, and in a few of her villages. In her country school districts she has the poorest school system of all the civilized countries of the earth.

[Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I have put all of that pamphlet into the RECORD, so that all that this distinguished Texas business man has to say on the situation can be examined in connection with these few pointed and searching extracts which I have read.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman also state that the man who made that speech is a Republican and a member of the Republican state committee?

Mr. BOUTELL. Gladly; for I did not think there was a Democrat in Texas capable of making such a speech. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, I want to say about this whole controversy that has been brought up by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] that I hope we will not have to allude to it again during this session and that we can pass on to more important matters. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL] have each made the mistake in discussing the present Payne tariff of using the language of excited and inflamed imaginations for describing what their hopes would lead them to wish for, instead of a reasonable discussion of the facts in the case. Observations upon a law of the land, made in that spirit outside of this House, deserves no attention whatever from anybody, as they would influence nobody except the man who dwells in the "forks of the creek." They are absolutely of no value to a reasonable and thinking man. But when such criticisms in such inflamed and exaggerated language are used on the floor of this House they must be answered. Mr. Chairman, in replying to the first speech of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY], who said that the people of this country were groaning under the Payne tariff, I simply made the straight denial that they were not groaning under the Payne tariff, because they are not groaning at all.

Now, the gentleman from Texas comes back to-day and gets upon the subject of prices and trusts and prosecutions and some other general matters that are about as far removed from the Payne tariff as the speeches of the demagogue to which our Texas business man alludes.

I have in my hand an article from the Austin Statesman, and if the Austin Statesman is anything but a Democratic newspaper I would like to have some gentleman from that Lone Star State explain what kind of a paper it is. I did think at first that I would read the article in full, but I am not going to do it, because it mentions the names of two Members of the Texas delegation whom I do not see present in the Chamber. I do not know whether this article expresses their views. If I had their consent, I would insert it in the RECORD, but without being able to see them and without being able to ask their permission, I am not going to read it in full so as to mention them by name. I have no quarrel, personal or political, with any Member of the Texas delegation until it appears that the generation of the men at the "forks of the creek" have disappeared and that a Republican can be elected, and then I will have a political quarrel in every district where that is likely to happen. Then I would be glad to go down to Texas and argue the matter.

But I do not wish to place anything in the RECORD which may interfere with the political plans of any Member of that delegation, or give an advantage to an opponent of his own party, and so I shall not read the names in this editorial, which is entitled "Free Cattle." I asked the gentleman from the eleventh district if he was in favor of free cattle and free rice and other articles which the papers of Texas, of Democratic complexion, favor placing a duty upon. I induced him to say that he would vote for the immediate repeal of the duty on rice. I am not sure that I quote him correctly in saying that he favored the immediate repeal of the duties on cattle on the hoof. I did understand him to finally say that he was in favor of free cattle. This article I hold in my hand refers to a bill which seeks to abolish the tariff duty on cattle and animals used for food, and says, "This bill is a scheme to place more money in the coffers of the beef trust," a bill introduced by one of the Texas delegation, and the exact language of the bill is:

Provided, That after the passage of this act all cattle and animals used for food purposes, whether live or dressed, shall be admitted free of duty.

And then the article goes on to state that another Representative from Texas was instrumental in sending this bill to the pigeonhole, after showing that to repeal the law levying a duty on cattle would be to extend a monopoly now enjoyed by the beef trust, and I took it from some of the outpourings of my friend from the eleventh district of Texas that he is not in favor of doing anything which would still further intrench what he is pleased and this editorial is pleased to call "the beef trust." This paper is opposed to the repeal of the duty on cattle, and the closing paragraph is illuminating:

The tariff question is becoming so complicated that few men know where they are at.

That is a great admission for a Texas Democrat.

Free hides did not reduce the price on shoes and other leather products, and the reduction of the tariff on lumber failed most signally to give us building material at a less price.

And in other editorials which I have here you find the same sentiments. One of them closes with this paragraph:

Texas is no longer for free trade.

Of course it is not. Texas wants a duty on rice and cattle and wool, and on other objects in which her people are interested. I said at the opening that it was wonderful how Democrats in the aggregate always applauded any allusion to misery, misfortune, or disaster. It is equally surprising to me that Democrats in the aggregate are always ready to applaud the unreasoning abuse of anyone, and no louder applause came from the other side of the House than in the threat which was made by the gentleman from Texas to put the officers of the beef trust in the penitentiary. I asked him in all sincerity what he meant by the beef trust? With some considerable scorn and ridicule he expressed a surprise that that question should come from a Representative from Chicago. The gentleman used the expression and it was used in the newspaper article to which I referred. I asked the gentleman in all candor what he meant by the beef trust? I ask it of him again. I ask it of the gentleman from the San Antonio district, who interrupted my remarks ten days ago and said that they would have greater prosperity in Texas if they could send somebody connected with the beef trust—I do not know but that he said the big four—to the penitentiary. I will ask the gentleman again what he meant by "the beef trust?" I will ask any gentleman who uses the expression what he means by the "big four?"

I do not know what they meant by either one, and I will say, Mr. Chairman, that in the discussions before the Committee on Ways and Means we often asked that question, and in our consultations, too, and some one would begin and say, "Why, the beef trust is So-and-so and So-and-so, you know," and that is as far as he would get, just mentioning two names. Well, two is not a very big four, and so when this abuse is being hurled at the beef trust and the big four, I say it is irrational, because it is indefinite, so long as the men who use the terms refuse to tell what they mean by them. But when the gentleman from the eleventh district and the gentleman from the San Antonio district refer with scorn to people of my district, thinking, perhaps, that some one connected with these organizations, the name and nature of which they can not or will not disclose, live in my district, I have this reply: Do not use that language if you expect to influence anybody but the men on the hill and the men "in the forks of the creek." If you mean anything by the beef trust, say what you mean. If you mean anything by the big four, say what you mean. When you rise here on your responsibility as a Member and say that you are going to send the officers of the beef trust to the penitentiary, name what you mean, and if you think they are individuals in my district, name them.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire any more time?

Mr. BOUTELL. I should desire a little more time.

Mr. PERKINS. How much more time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. BOUTELL. I think about ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I yield fifteen minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL].

Mr. BOUTELL. We do not add at all to the information that goes to the country, we do not add at all to the dignity of debate in this House by this irrational abuse of corporations which can not be specifically named, individuals who only appear in the excited imagination of the men who make the charge. But as long as the gentleman from the San Antonio district and the gentleman from the eleventh district have referred to individuals from my State in speaking about Texas and Texas prosperity, I take pleasure and pride in alluding to the fact that Texas does owe a debt of gratitude to one man of my district, a man whom I had the honor, after many interims, to succeed on the floor of this House. It was a man who previously represented my district on the floor of this House and afterwards the State of Illinois in the Senate who built the magnificent statehouse of the State of Texas in their beautiful capital city—the late Charles B. Farwell.

I want to tell the people of Texas another thing about these days of prosperity which have dawned for them. I want to say that three Chicago men have done more than all other agencies put together, with the exception of the railroads, to carry the settlement of Texas back from the coast line, to raise the values of your farm land, to give you the present price of wheat, corn, oats, barley, and rye. These three men are the inventor of the reaper and of farming machinery, who resided not only in my district but in my own ward, a name that will be honored for all time to come, when the names of generals and admirals and statesmen are forgotten—Cyrus H. McCormick, the inventor of the reaper and other farm machinery. [Loud applause on the Republican side.] The other two are those who established the packing plants in the South and West and helped to found the great Chicago houses and gave value to the Texas steer on the range—Philip D. Armour and Gustavus Swift. These three men from the city of Chicago, all now gone to their reward, are men whose names are to be remembered with gratitude by every citizen of the State of Texas, and by every man who owns an acre of farm land, wherever it is.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I will bring my desultory remarks to a close.

Mr. HARDY. Will the gentleman allow me? I would like to correct a statement which the gentleman made in his colloquy with my colleague [Mr. HENRY of Texas] by reading the quotation of the price of beef. The gentleman spoke of cattle on the hoof bringing $10 in Texas. I have the quotations of January 21, and I find this quotation of cattle prices at Fort Worth, Tex.:

Beef steers, choice quality, averaging 1,169 pounds, brought $6 on a higher-priced basis, with good demand. Butcher stock, market active and strong to higher; a part load, showing good quality, sold at $4.35, while the carload topped was $3.60.

Mr. BOUTELL. Is the gentleman in favor of repealing the duty on cattle?

Mr. HARDY. These were the prices, instead of $10, which the gentleman was talking about, that lead to the present high prices of beef.

Mr. BOUTELL. I was asking the gentleman from Texas if he was in favor of repealing the duty on cattle.

Mr. HARDY. I would repeal the duty on everything to eat. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. BOUTELL. Of course, including rice and sugar.

Mr. HARDY. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. BOUTELL. I wanted to answer what the gentleman said about the price of cattle; but I now yield to the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GAINES. I want to read from the Washington Post of February 7—yesterday, I believe:

Swift & Co.'s sale of fresh beef in Washington, D. C., for the week ending Saturday, February 5, averaged 8.2 cents per pound.

In view of the price stated in Chicago, that by the gentleman from Texas for beef on the hoof in Texas, and the price at which it is sold by the Chicago people in Washington, it would seem that there is not, after all, so great a profit upon the steer.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I would like to ask the gentleman from West Virginia if he has been buying any beefsteaks in Washington lately? [Laughter on the Democratic side.]

Mr. HARDY. Just allow me for one moment. I wish to say that if a Texas steer costs 10 cents down there, and it is taken to Chicago and sold at 8 cents, that reverses anything I ever heard of.

Mr. BOUTELL. The gentleman from Texas will find when I go into the matter of prices, which I promise myself the satisfaction of dealing with some time soon, he will find a great many illustrations of where things are sold for less than they cost. They are sold at less than they cost to the retailer. I have here a circular from a Washington market that is selling the best granulated sugar at 5 cents a pound, and that granulated sugar cost him $5.35 a hundred pounds. So that it is not at all extraordinary to find cases where goods are selling at much less than they cost the trader.

I must decline to yield for the present until I have answered this question. I said, in reply to the gentleman from Texas, who was speaking about the price of beef and trying to connect it with the hungry children in my city in 1908—I said that I was not at all surprised that beef was high, when heavy prime steers sold at $10 a hundred pounds on the hoof; and I say here now that there have been many instances within the last ninety days when prime heavy steers sold at over $10 on the hoof, and I can only regret that there are none of them left in the gentleman's State.

Also that there are plenty of them left in the State of the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] if the high prices have not brought them all out, and I think he could bear witness to the fact that in his own district prime heavy steers have been held at $10, and that hogs have sold as high as $9.

Mr. HARDY rose.

Mr. BOUTELL. Let me say, so that the gentleman from Texas will not be uneasy, that I decline to yield until I have answered this question, then if I have time I shall be glad to do so. I have in my hand here a paper of November 11, 1909, with this heading:

Iowa beeves at $9.25—Chicago packer pays within 5 cents of open market top since 1882.

What a pathetic spectacle is there, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, of the farmers in the great progressive State of Iowa holding up the Chicago packers and making them pay $9.25 last November for beef on the hoof?

I have here another paper dated November 13:

Reached the $8.20 top notch—Hog market reaches highest level ever known at this season of the year.

So my reply to the gentleman from the eleventh district of Texas was not far out of the way.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let me bring what I have to say in this desultory manner to a close. I wish to speak on this subject of prevailing prices with relation to the tariff at a later day. I shall also hope to speak about the effect of the financial legislation of the Republican party upon industrial conditions. And I am glad to know that the people of Texas have benefited as much as those from any other State from those conditions. I must use the few moments that I have left in replying categorically to a few of the questions raised in colloquy by the gentleman from the eleventh district of Texas.

Thomas Jefferson held one idea firmly to his death, namely, that he would like to amend the Federal Constitution so as to limit federal revenues to duties on foreign imports. In 1811 he wrote to Robert Gallatin, congratulating him upon the repeal of the internal-revenue taxes, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] will remember, if no other gentleman on that side does, the language of that letter to Gallatin, in which he said:

I believe that the revival of the internal-revenue tax would ruin any administration that tried it.

Thomas Jefferson, the founder of what was then called the Republican party, now named the Democratic party, favored amending the Constitution so as to limit the federal revenues to duties on foreign imports. He was opposed, as a matter of policy, to every kind of an income or internal-revenue tax.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. BOUTELL. Yes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Did not Thomas Jefferson also recommend the adoption of a maximum and minimum plan of tariff, against which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] inveighed this morning?

Mr. BOUTELL. Quite correct, and I am going to have the pleasure of referring to that again, although I put it in full in the RECORD in my speech on the tariff when the Payne bill was originally discussed in the House.

The maximum and minimum rate in our tariff, against which the gentleman from the eleventh district inveighed, and which as great a man as Prof. Woodrow Wilson, in his article in the North American Review, says is the greatest joke in the Payne tariff, that maximum and minimum was outlined by Thomas Jefferson as Secretary of State in his report to Congress in 1793, approved by Washington and all his Cabinet, only Jefferson went a step further than we go in the Payne law. What he said in his recommendation was substantially this, and I must quote from memory: "A fair and reasonable rate to all nations that treat us fairly and reasonably. For others, an additional and higher rate, and, if necessary, prohibition." Thomas Jefferson went a step further in the matter of the maximum than we have gone, and favored a prohibitive rate, the absolute exclusion of certain goods where another country treated us unfairly. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Does the gentleman desire any more time?

Mr. BOUTELL. I should like about five minutes more.

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes more.

Mr. BOUTELL. So that when the Democratic party claims that the income tax is some sort of a cherished possession of the Democracy they do not know the horn books of their own party. It was repudiated by Jefferson and never taken up again until it was advanced within very recent years by one who even on that side of the House is not considered a very good historical Democrat.

Now, as to this matter of the duties on the agriculture schedule, there are duties fixed in this bill and in all recent tariffs, both Republican and Democratic, which, to my mind, have absolutely no effect in protecting the home industries. They have, as is shown, little or no effect in the revenues.

In my opinion, speaking personally for myself, the food products in the agricultural schedule, together with cattle and meats, would better be put on the free list. But you can not go into a caucus on that side of the House and get 10 men who would agree to such a schedule. So much for that.

Has the Payne tariff had any effect in advancing the prices of necessaries? I close what I have to say with just this one statement, and we will argue it out during the rest of this session, but remember my friends of the minority, do not make any mistake by talking here to the man on the hill and the man in the forks of the creek. If you do, the country will get onto you. You now talk about prices being raised by the Payne tariff. We waited eagerly for somebody on that side to fall into the mistake of making that point for possible political advantage. I am glad it was first made by a leader on that side in two different speeches—by the gentleman from New York. It has been amplified by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HENRY] and by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. HULL]. Whenever the statement has been made it has been received with rapturous applause on that side of the House. We met you on that issue and said, "We will have an investigation into the prevailing high prices," and I want every possible agency that can be employed to make that investigation. I speak as an ultimate consumer myself, and I speak on behalf of the interests of the millions of other ultimate consumers. I speak for an exclusively city district; I speak for a district that is paying the high prices of the raw materials of food that come from the farmers. I am in favor of the fullest possible investigation.

Mr. HEFLIN and Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOUTELL. I must decline to yield, as my time is about to expire. I would like to see the tariff experts appointed under the Payne tariff act take this up and look into the prices of imported articles. I would like to see the Senate committee look into the whole subject of prices. I would like to see a committee of this House composed exclusively of members of the minority take it up.

I would like to see an investigation into this matter of prevailing high prices made by a committee composed of one delegate each from the boards of trade of every Southern State. But you gentlemen from the agricultural districts, you do not want an investigation, and the country is getting onto your bluff. You are getting letters from your constituents, and they are saying, "We do not want any investigation that will reduce the price of cattle. We do not want any investigation that will put cattle on the free list. We do not want any investigation that will reduce the price of wheat, of corn, of oats, of rice." That is the trouble; you have made a mistake; you have put your heads into the noose, and we are going to draw it tighter and tighter, and we are going to show the country the blunder you have made in attributing an advance in prices to the Payne tariff.

I close with a statement which everybody who has studied the Payne tariff knows is true. Every man in this body ought to know it. Investigation by a commission such as I have suggested, made up exclusively of Democrats from agricultural districts, would prove it, and it would be a unanimous report of all that investigated this subject of high prices: There is not in the Payne tariff law a single advance in rate above the Dingley rates that justifies an increase in the final retail price to the ultimate consumer of a single necessary article of food, of clothing, or of household use. Read that statement in the RECORD to-morrow morning and ponder it. That is what the investigation will show and what you gentlemen of the minority do not want to have shown. And the agricultural districts are opposed to any agitation that threatens the present high prices of their products. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

APPENDIX A.

Texas prosperity.

[An address delivered by J. O. Terrell, of San Antonio, before the annual meeting of the Commercial Secretaries Association of San Antonio, Tex., December 10, 1909.]

I do not think that a more useless task could be assigned to a man than that of delivering a speech on "prosperity." Prosperity speaks for itself. It is silver tongued and vocal with the inspiring melodies of a thousand harps. It is business set to music, and its refrain carries gladness to every heart. It sounds no note of sorrow.

It is "sweetness and light" to the family hearthstone and the balm of Gilead for a nation or a State. Under its inspiration the desert blooms and the waste places are restored. Its pulsations reach out to all the varied haunts of humanity and its touch adds a new ribbon to the hat of the peasant maiden and pins a plume on that of her friend who happens to be the child of fortune and aristocracy.

It comes with majestic step through the fruited cornfields, through the waving wheat, and through the cotton patch. It is seen in the herd that grazes on the hills and in the creamery that stands in the valley. It shows in the smoke that rises from factories and in the revolutions of their tireless wheels. It is heard in the clink of the dollars at the banker's counter and in the touch of the full pails that belong to the tin-bucket brigade. But it means more than this. It means more than the accumulation of wealth. It can not be measured by mere dollars and cents. It means a vast structure, with justice, virtue, morality, and intelligence as the corner stones. It means a steady growth in these great characteristics and principles. Without them any structure is built upon the sands. It finds its happiest development in the schoolroom, where red-cheeked children crowd the benches and youthful ardor masters the experience of the past and aspires to dominion of the future.

Is it here? Is it here in full-blown glory? Is its stature dwarfed or its splendor diminished? Has it brought contentment to our people, and are they satisfied with their finances, their servants, or their government? Is there any spirit of discontent floating in the air, and if so why? Texas is the paradise of bucolic production; is it the "Vale of Avoca" for the contented soul? I hardly think so, and I will tell you why.

Texas surpasses all of her sister States in the production of cotton, rice, cattle, and demagogues. Her cotton is largely shipped to other lands, where it is manufactured and sold by the purchasers at a great profit. Her cattle and rice feed the world. Her demagogues are reserved solely for home consumption and appear to be as useless and prolific as the house fly.

There is no demand for them anywhere, because all lands are overstocked, and human thought stands appalled at an effort to ascertain a reason for their existence.

Some one has said that the demagogue was created to make the world humble, because he always endeavored to keep it dissatisfied.

He is found in every community, and whatever be his fault he can not be accused of a lack of industry. Everywhere he is constantly telling the people that they are being cruelly robbed, that they are absolutely at the mercy of more favored sections, that their rulers are corrupt, that government is a farce, and that justice has no temple on the earth.

He has thus talked so often and so long to the people of Texas that in many places he has become enthroned as a deity, worshipped as a statesman, and loved as a patriot. Whole communities listen with bated breath when he speaks, and admiring parents point him out to their children as the lofty spirit who constantly shields them from the oppression of the world. It goes so far that many of our people believe that they are in danger of becoming white slaves, and some of them actually glory in the faith that they are downtrodden and oppressed. There used to be an old man in Eastern Texas, who when one inquired how he was getting along, always answered, "Poorly, poorly; thank God."

It is really strange that our people listen to the demagogue, but they do. It is stranger still that they elect him to office; but they do. It seems clear that they prefer to be told of their misfortunes than to be told of their faults. The demagogue tells them that they have no faults, but many misfortunes, and they believe him. He weeps with them, and they vote for him. He tells them that the corporations are thirsting for his blood, and they fly to arms in his defense. They do not seem to realize that he is an 18-karat fraud and a 16 to 1 hypocrite, and that he is the most expensive nuisance that ever beset a State. He has cost Texas more money than all the tariff sheets ever invented. He has done her more damage than all the armies that ever marched against her; but "with all his faults she loves him still."

I assert to-day that Texas is, in climate, soil, and productiveness, the "Garden of the Lord," and that if in any particular she is behind any sister State the cause of the default is in her laws or in the demagogues who make or execute them.

To demonstrate this, I beg you to consider for a brief moment her unparalleled resources. She produces annually nearly 4,000,000 bales of cotton and 2,000,000 tons of cotton seed. She leads all the States in the production of cattle and of rice. She can be put abreast with any of them in the production of corn, oats, hay, pork, iron, poultry, or dairy products. She produces more oil than she does milk. She is numbered among the first in the production of lumber, coal, horses, sheep, and fruits. Beyond question she leads the world in the production of raw materials. Other States may lead in the production of some of the things enumerated, but no other State can produce them all. Illinois can produce more corn, but she produces neither cotton nor rice. Pennsylvania may produce more iron, but she has fewer cattle. It is one of the strangest facts in the history of our country that, with such wonderful resources, the people of Texas are constantly complaining that their lot is hard and that the wealth of the Nation is rapidly concentrating in the bleak and barren States of New England, where, to quote the famous phrase of Governor Coke in describing Alaska, "they have nine months winter and the other three d——d cold weather."

A great many years ago Hon. David B. Culberson, one of the boldest and ablest of our public servants, a man who was not afraid to think and not afraid to say what he thought, in a speech at Honey Grove, said: "The north is the main beneficiary of our crops. We pay out our money for the products manufactured from the raw material which we produce. The North employs the great auxiliary agencies of skill and intelligence in the production of wealth, while the South relies on muscle and the mule. We furnish the raw material and the North takes it from us and converts it into finished and manufactured products and sells them back to us, plus freight both ways, at a profit of from 100 to 500 per cent over the value of the raw material."

Some one then asked him why the manufacturers did not bring their mills here, and at least save the freights, and replying, among other reasons, he said: "Capital at the North is reluctant to come among us. Social disorders, inspired by depraved politicians, alarm our rich brethren at the North." Perhaps those conditions continue to this day.

Did you ever think of it? The South has received about $6,000,000,000 in the last ten years for her cotton crop. A sum so vast the human mind can scarcely comprehend, and the statement causes us to ask the question, What has become of these vast sums of money, this river of gold that has run through the Southern States year by year? The southern farmers have created by their toil in the last ten years and have received gold therefor enough money to almost buy the earth. The question arises to the inquiring mind, What has become of our "river of gold?" The answer is easy. It has gone to other States, for if you take away from the tax lists the amount of land values—and the earth was here when we commenced to make this great wealth—we have very little to show for the billions of dollars that have passed through our hands.

Do you know where it has gone? Yes; everyone knows that. Everyone knows that we pay out nearly everything we make for various manufactured articles. The land that produces and sells raw materials is rarely prosperous or happy. Such a system may be romantic, but it is void of common business sense. The mill and the field should stand side by side. The speeches delivered against tariffs or trusts, the gold standard, or corporations may tickle the farmer's ear, but they are "as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals" so long as he tries to match his muscle and the mule against intellect and skill. No purely agricultural country can successfully compete in the race for wealth against manufacturing industry. It has been said that "England, on a space of less than 10 square miles, could place all her cotton mills, and within that inclosure she could take the entire product of southern cotton farms and by manufacturing create as much wealth and employ as much labor as the South produces and employs in all her cotton fields." This illustration can be applied locally to every city in Texas. A factory can be erected on a vacant lot that will create more wealth and employ more labor than 10,000 acres of cultivated land.

Something more than a year ago, in addressing the State Bankers' Association at Forth Worth along these lines, I said:

"The Texas farmer rises early in the morning and slips into clothes made in New York and shoes made in Massachusetts. He cuts his fire wood with an ax made in Pennsylvania and an ax handle made in Wisconsin. He builds a fire in a stove made in Michigan, and his wife, dressed in goods woven in New Hampshire, proceeds to fry bacon that was packed in Illinois and potatoes that were grown in Colorado. She makes biscuit with lard rendered in Nebraska and wheat grown in Kansas. At breakfast he eats from dishes made in Ohio, and uses a table and chairs from Minnesota. He goes to the field and uses a plow from Indiana and a hoe from Connecticut. When he retires to rest he blows out a lamp made in Chicago and falls upon a bed whose springs were made in Pittsburg, whose frame was made in Detroit, and whose blankets came from San Francisco."

The list can be indefinitely extended. "For years the thrifty North has sold us our necessities, and now it is also selling us our luxuries. Take the item of automobiles alone. You see them everywhere. In some towns the bootblacks have them. They are growing in popularity beyond any invention of recent years. Texas is paying out hundreds of thousands of dollars for them, but not one to my knowledge is manufactured in a Southern State.

"We sell cows and buy butter; we sell steers and buy beef; we sell fruit and buy preserves; we sell hides and buy leather; we sell wool and buy blankets; we sell cotton and buy calico; and then we stand up like brave men and cuss old man ALDRICH and the little State of Rhode Island. Would that we could sell a great many demagogues and buy a few statesmen. To be plain about it, I would like to purchase ALDRICH himself and keep him down here a few years. I believe it would be a great investment. He would certainly turn things upside down. I would enjoy hearing those New England 'Yankees' groaning and complaining that the South was getting all of their money.

"Gentlemen, do you wonder that the South is dissatisfied? Are you surprised when you hear complaints? Do you wonder that her newspapers are constantly telling of her woes? Whose is the fault? Where is the cause and where is the cure? Can conditions be reversed by constantly abusing the northern manufacturers? We have tried that plan for more than a quarter of a century, and our hearts are weary.

"Can hope come from special laws intended to benefit our farmers? Our statutes are reeking to-day with such legislation. Even as discontented a man as Mr. D. J. Neill, the late president of the Farmers' Union, declared over his signature last year that 'the farmers of Texas have no cause to complain of the government of Texas.'

"Can it come from political conventions, from silver-tongued orators, from high-sounding platform declarations? Alas! we have already had more of those things than any other land under the sun.

"Can we reach it by abusing the trusts? The trusts care but little how we abuse them so long as we continue to buy from them. Has anyone quit buying from them? We will not permit them to do business in Texas, but we send them our dollars just the same. If we had a few trusts ourselves they might worry the people of some other State, but they would bring their money here. They would create a balance of trade in our favor. I have noticed few complaints of the trusts from the States in which they are situated. An old farmer friend once declared to me in a confidential way that most of his troubles arose from the fact that he paid more for the things he bought than he received from the things he sold. He seemed surprised when I told him that much of the trouble of the world arose from the same cause. That is the ailment of Texas to-day.

"And yet the case is plain and the remedy is easy. Build factories in the Southern States. Do not wait for a new generation; build them now. Let their smoke rise like incense. Let them double and treble the value of our raw materials, and let the money of the South remain at home. Do you know why this was not done long ago? I answer: The demagogue. Demagogues and factories do not flourish in the same soil. Suppose you had $20,000 to invest, would you invest it to-day in a factory in Texas? Now, if you wished to invest it in a farm, the laws would guard you as well as laws could possibly do. Your land would be assessed at about two-thirds of its value. You would pay no occupation tax and no tax on intangible values. By 'intangible values' I think our government means values that do not really exist; but, at any rate, you would pay no taxes upon them. If you raised 1,000 bales of cotton and 5,000 bushels of corn you would pay no taxes upon them, because you are an agriculturist. You would pay no occupation taxes, no franchise taxes, and no gross-receipts taxes. If your products failed to bring high prices you could organize with your fellowmen and demand high prices. If they were really bringing high prices you would, of course, proceed to organize and demand higher prices. If you wished them to bring still higher prices, you would meet and organize again. Just where the limit would be I do not know. It has not yet been reached.

"But let us suppose that you really desired to aid your State, and, with others, build a factory and put in your $20,000. What would happen? You would proceed to form a corporation, and, first, you would pay to the State a charter fee in advance. Then you would pay annually in advance a franchise tax, also annually you would pay an occupation tax. Then you would probably pay annually a gross-receipts tax, although, as a matter of fact, your expenses may have actually exceeded your income. All the while you would be paying an ad valorem tax on the full amount of your $20,000, and likewise you would probably be called on to pay taxes on about $20,000 worth of intangible values that you did not really possess. If you failed to pay practically any of these taxes your business would be promptly closed up, your charter forfeited, and your property placed in the hands of a receiver. If, however, you managed to earn enough money to pay all your taxes this would be taken as positive proof that you belonged to a trust, and the attorney-general's department would bring a suit against you for a few millions in penalties, and a jury composed exclusively of gentlemen who had put up the price of raw material upon you would assess the fine. Even if you could then pay the fine, the courts would seize your property and sell it to the highest bidder, and neither you nor any corporation interested in a similar business would be allowed to bid. This would, of course, cause it to bring a fair price. All this time, however, you could console yourself by listening to the silvery voice of the demagogue crying: 'Hurrah for grand old Texas! Hurrah for the people! Down with the trusts. No corporation can ever fasten its fetters on grand old Texas.'"

Yes, we give great encouragement to manufacturing plants—to locate somewhere else, and they generally do it.

"The trouble with many of our laws is that they do not help, but hinder. By keeping the manufacturer away they lessen the farmer's profits, but our natural resources are so great that he can probably survive the loss. The serious point is that it teaches him bad morals. One great fundamental truth should guide all legislation. It is that while grass grows and water runs we should have the same laws for all classes of men. No logic can evade this sublime declaration. It is unanswerable because it is right. It was right in the 'morning of the world.' It was right when Mary's Son walked beneath the bending palms of Palestine. It is right to-day.

"When we turn from it, we begin to pass laws to please the majority and to injure the minority. We begin to quote that pernicious phrase about giving the greatest good to the greatest number. We begin to forget that statesmanship in every age has found its noblest duty in the protection of the few from the rapacity of the many.

"Once started on this line we know not where to stop. Sometimes we endeavor to pass laws that will permit us to do things which they forbid in others. Sometimes we realize that such laws might be unconstitutional, and then we pass them to apply to all, but only enforce them against others. Of this condition it can only be said that it sears the conscience of any people who permit its existence.

"Take for illustration the present trust laws of Texas. Are they being enforced against farmers? You read almost weekly of great meetings that fix the price of cotton and cotton seed at abnormal prices. Do you read of any indictments against the men who fix the prices? Do you hear of any of the young gentlemen in the attorney-general's office traveling over the State and endeavoring to stop the fixing? Never! These young gentlemen are traveling over other States searching for evidence to convict other people from putting up prices on things we buy. They appear to think that it is entirely proper to combine and put up prices on the things we have so sell. Do you think it is virtuous to put up the price of cotton seed and a crime to put up the price of oil? Do you think that it can be commendable to agree to put up the price of wheat and a sin to agree to put up the price of lard when both of them go into the same biscuit? If you think so, you need a new conscience. People of Texas, such laws injure you more than anyone else. It is true that you may occasionally put a little money in your treasury by such practices. You may take a million or so from an oil company and rob its stockholders of their property. You may fine the manufacturers of machinery and drive them from your State. You may collect a few dollars now and then from various business men who attempt to do what you are doing, but you can not repeal that sublime text: 'Whatsoever you would that men should do unto you, do you even so unto them.'

"It does not pay to be unfair. Leaving aside all questions of morality and justice, it does not pay even from a monetary point of view. Kerosene oil furnishes light for the farmer's home. Do you think it will go down in price when the Waters-Pierce Company is finally dismantled? You are still buying harvesting machinery. Has the price gone down? You are still buying all sorts of manufactured articles. Have your servants at Austin reduced prices upon them? Don't you really think it would be better business sense to bring the manufactories down here, take a little stock in them, sell them some supplies, and make money in fair trade with them, instead of continually persecuting them for doing exactly as you are doing? Do you realize that if they were here our money would be kept at home, and that you would occasionally see some of it a second time? What good are our state antitrust laws doing? I will give any one of you a week to answer that question and it will then remain unanswered. Now, do you know what would happen if they were repealed?

"First. Men from everywhere would hasten to put their money in manufacturing plants in Texas.

"Second. The personal wealth of the State would double in five years.

"Third. The prices we are paying for manufactured articles would be promptly and greatly reduced.

"But what would then become of the demagogue? All the old issues are frozen stiff. What would he talk about if the trust issue should go like greenbackism, free silverism, and all the other isms have gone? Perhaps he could still appeal to the 'man in the forks of the creek.' The fork dweller has become quite a character in our politics.

"Frequently he lives on the bills, but for campaign purposes we always locate him at the forks. He is supposed to be absolutely impervious to reason. He is the 'old guard' in the battalions of ignorance. The demagogue is the only connection he has with the world. He believes what the demagogue tells him because his ears have heard no other sound. The periods of the orator, the tables of the statistician, the wit of the essayist have no more effect upon him than has the dew upon the pyramids. Perhaps if the trust issue were buried the demagogue could talk to him about the public school system of Texas, for the poor fellow actually believes that Texas has a good public school system. This is the most cruel delusion that the demagogue has fastened upon him. I believe I will demolish it here, because there can be no real prosperity anywhere without educating childhood. Texas has a fair public school system in all of her cities, in some of her towns, and in a few of her villages. In her country school districts she has the poorest school system of all the civilized countries of the earth. Let me give you a few figures, taken from the records of 1907, and which are doubtless a fair average with any other year. In that year Texas had in round numbers, within scholastic ages, about 265,000 children in the cities, towns, and villages, and about 625,000 in the country districts. Of this 625,000 over 87,000 did not even start to school. Now, will you stop a minute and think of that? If the same average runs through other years you can easily calculate that nearly 45,000 young men from the forks of the creek, and who never attended school, become voters every year. What sort of votes will they be? But this is not all. During that year there was an average daily absence from our country schools of nearly 263,000 children. In other words, out of every 100 children residing in the country 47 were out of school all the time in 1907.

"Let me give you a few more figures. The people residing in the cities and towns of Texas have invested in schoolhouses and grounds $36.17 for each child in scholastic age, while the people of the country districts have invested for such purposes only $6.05 per child. Every independent district in Texas, except two, had a library in 1907, but of the 8,701 country districts only 547 had libraries.

"Now let me compare the situation with that in other States. The scholastic age in Texas runs from 7 to 17. It is longer in every other State or Territory in the Union. Texas is at the foot of the list. One can only go to a public school in Texas ten years. In New York he can go sixteen years, and in Massachusetts he can go as long as he lives. The average length of the public school term in Massachusetts is 187 days; in Texas it is 116 days. Massachusetts spent for the education of each child in 1907 $26.42, while Texas spent $5.54. The average for all the States of the Union is more than double that of Texas. And yet you occasionally hear some apparently sensible man talk loftily about the splendid free school system of Texas, and the demagogue is always boasting about it. He boasts of it because he fears to tell the people that they ought to tax themselves and educate their children. Really he does not wish them educated, because he can control them better when they are ignorant. He delights to tell them that they are smart. You will hear him say, 'The corporation can fool them fellows in town, but you boys in the forks of the creek are on to their curves.' And they believe him. The parents of the poor boy in the forks of the creek honestly believe that their child, growing up without education, will be able to compete with the educated child from Massachusetts.

"And yet one of our wisest men said: 'Education is the most valuable of all assets. It can not be lost, it can not be stolen, it can not be taken away. When misfortune has scattered riches and poverty has conquered wealth, the educated brain remains to furnish either a foundation for a new fortune or consolation for the one that was lost.'

"Gentlemen, Texas has survived and is surviving such conditions. In spite of them she enjoys a kind of prosperity, but not the real article to which she is justly entitled. She is only receiving a small dividend, when she should have 100 per cent. Some day she will have her rights. Some time she will push the demagogue aside and step to the front wearing the robes of victory.

"I know not when the dawn will come, but I know the night will break. The light is already beginning to shine upon the red hills of Georgia. It is moving along the valley of the inland river, which in the ancient days nurtured the laurel and the willow that shadowed the blue and the gray. It is seen in the factories of the Carolinas and in the glow of the furnaces of Alabama. And it will come to Texas.

"I turn my eyes to the future. I believe that they will yet see the 'Glory of the coming of the Lord.' I may never enter the promised land, but I can see the mountain tops. The wilderness may bury the present generation, but the next shall enter Canaan. Old prejudices will surely pass away. The light shall penetrate the darkness and this imperial State, boundless in natural resources, glorious of climate, and fertile of soil shall come unto her own."

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LONGWORTH having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18282) making appropriations to supply urgent deficiencies in appropriations for the fiscal year 1910, and for other purposes, had further insisted upon its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had asked a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. GALLINGER, and Mr. CLAY as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will now ask the gentleman from Georgia to consume some of his time.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield one hour to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. MACON].

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed I will yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HEFLIN].

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Chairman, I want to say in the one minute yielded to me by the gentleman from Arkansas that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BOUTELL] has stated that we of this side are getting letters from the farmers saying that they do not want any investigation of the causes of the high price of foodstuffs. I want to say that I have not received a letter from anybody denying that they want an investigation into the high prices of foodstuffs. I do not believe that any farmer has written such a letter. Nobody on this side has received such a letter. The Democratic party stands now asking for an investigation of the high price of foodstuffs, and the Republican party, it will be shown, through its meat trust is responsible for the high price of meat, and so on. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message of the Senate, by Mr. Crockett, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 579) to correct the lineal and relative rank of certain officers of the United States Army.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution of the Senate (S. J. Res. 59) providing for the filling of vacancies to occur on January 27, 1910, in the Board of Regents of the Smithsonian Institution of the class other than Members of Congress.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment the bill (H. R. 17531) to amend an act authorizing the Washington, Spa Springs and Gretta Railroad Company, of Maryland, to enter the District of Columbia, with amendments, approved February 18, 1907.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, before I proceed I will ask unanimous consent to be allowed to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman if his remarks are going to have any reference to myself or the Immigration Commission?

Mr. MACON. Yes, they are; but there will not be any unparliamentary language inserted in connection with them.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Mr. Chairman, for the present I object.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, that is only in keeping with the policy which has been employed by that side of the House whenever any attempt has been made upon this side to expose the rotten expenditures of any commission appointed by the majority of the House. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

A few days ago, upon advices received from different sources, I made some remarks upon the extravagances of the Immigration Commission which was appointed by this House nearly three years ago, and, I think, after deliberate reflection and investigation that I was justified in everything I said. I know I had foundation for what I said, for a year ago the same question was advocated in the Senate and also in the House by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], a Republican, and certain exposures were made of the extravagances of the commission at that time. Now, after they have had ample opportunity of investigating immigration questions, when they have expended $657,992.67, without giving to the country any adequate return therefor, and I saw fit to oppose a further extension of the life of the commission and an additional appropriation of $125,000, which was asked in order that it might live another year, a mighty howl is waged against me for doing so. I did it, sir, without any partisan feeling whatever. I realized that the commission was composed of Democrats as well as Republicans and I realized that wherever Democrats have shortcomings they ought to be exposed as well as Republicans who commit wrongful acts.

But after making a statement in regard to the matter that was predicated upon truth in every material sense and every material point, it was then that the coxcomb member of the commission [laughter on the Democratic side] became offended and came to this House and undertook to defend the extravagant expenditures of the commission. When he arose to a question of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman, there was not a voice raised against it on this side, though we knew he had no question of privilege to present to the House. A point of order could have been made against his request, and he could not have been heard, but no one upon this side desired to smother anything in connection with the matter. If Democracy desires to smother corruption anywhere at any time, Mr. Chairman, I hope to God there will be some power that will expose it to the American people to the extent that it will never have national recognition now or at any time in the future. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The gentleman from New York was allowed to speak without limit in reply to what I said, and had full opportunity of saying everything he desired, and when I asked to be heard in reply I was immediately limited by a Republican objection to thirty minutes, while the gentleman from New York had had the privilege of speaking without limit.

Further than that, there was denied to me by a Republican objection the poverty-stricken privilege of revising my remarks in the RECORD, in order that I might correct any incongruity of speech that may have appeared in my remarks by reason of haste or interruption of debate. Even that was denied by a Republican objection, and to-day, when I come to speak from the RECORD, I am met with a Republican objection again, and by the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], whom I did not object to being heard as he desired when he asked to be heard upon a question of privilege that he did not have. Such magnanimity, Mr. Chairman, as that is damnable, and I say to the gentleman that his conduct in regard to the matter is characteristic of the littleness of the man with whom I am dealing.

When the gentleman from New York undertook to answer the charges I presented to this House as a reason why it should not make a further appropriation of $125,000 to continue the life of this Immigration Commission, the gentleman denounced my author as a liar and the facts upon which they were predicated as a lie out of the whole cloth.

Mr. Chairman, that was not a brave act. The gentleman knew that under the rules of the House the man he denounced as a liar did not have opportunity to reply, did not have opportunity to defend himself against the charge, and he knew that under the Constitution he could not hold him responsible elsewhere for what he said upon this floor. That was a very high character of bravery, indeed, that caused a Member of this House to denounce one who had no opportunity to defend himself against the attack here or elsewhere as a liar. Indeed it is the kind of courage that would cause a strong man to take a newborn, helpless babe and whip it to a finish. [Laughter and applause.] Such bravery! [Laughter.] It deserves a monument that will almost kiss the skies, and if I were the gentleman from New York I would be so proud of myself for having exercised it that I would hardly know how to contain myself because of it. Oh, such noble courage! It is great. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, let us see if my informant was a liar. For a Member of the House to say that some one is a liar who is not in the House or that facts stated by another is a lie out of the whole cloth is not binding upon anybody; it does not make it the truth by a jugful. [Laughter and applause.] If the words of one person denouncing another as a liar make it so, then I have an interview on my desk that appeared in the Star of this city a few days ago which makes the gentleman from New York a liar. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman's speech in defense of the Immigration Commission against charges of extravagances and delay made by me disclosed that Mr. J. H. Patten, secretary of the Immigration Restriction League and chairman of the national legislative committee of the American Purity Federation, was my informant that was denounced as a liar by the gentleman from New York, and that part of the daily press of the country that is controlled by special interests heralded his denunciation of Mr. Patten over the country, and, in doing so, sought to impress the casual reader with the idea that I, perhaps, had made false statements in my charges of extravagance and delay upon the part of the commission by heading the reports of his speech with big headlines such as "MACON's facts coldly false," and so forth.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is easy to denounce a statement as false, just as it is easy to call a defenseless person a liar, but proving the fact is a different thing. After the gentleman had made his speech in reply to what I had to say in regard to the conduct of the commission, Mr. Patten was interviewed by an Evening Star reporter of this city on Thursday, January 27, and, among other things, said:

Representative BENNET is quite mistaken in representing that I did anything one year ago last fall to prevent his reelection to Congress.

His allegations, in so far as they are material and implicate me as knowingly or unknowingly misrepresenting the situation, are absolutely untrue, false, and unfounded in fact, and he does not dare to prosecute my statements or to make his libelous statements in an unprivileged place.

One year ago Representative VICTOR MURDOCK, of his own motion and notion, and without any knowledge on my part, called attention to the commission's expenditures. Similarly Senator GARY, in the Senate, February 18, 1909.

The best authority is perhaps Representative TAWNEY, who said Monday, after the debate on the commission's expenditures, according to page 947 of the RECORD: "All the facts brought out in this debate came to the Committee on Appropriations, were discussed," and resulted in the commission's curtailment.

I mention this to show that the gist of the episode certainly can not be attributed to my fabrications, as Mr. BENNET's accusations allege.

Mr. Chairman, if the remarks of the gentleman from New York made Mr. Patten a liar in deed and in truth, I want to know if Mr. Patten's statement has not made him a liar. [Laughter.]

Mr. Patten says the statement of the gentleman from New York is libelous, and that he dare not make it in an unprivileged place; and therefore, Mr. Chairman, coming back to my statement of a few days ago, I think I was justified when I said that Mr. Patten was entitled to as much credit upon this floor for truthfulness and veracity as the gentleman from New York until it could be shown that the gentleman from New York was a saint and Mr. Patten was a liar, and I knew the gentleman from New York was not a saint. [Applause.] But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York said that the facts furnished me by Mr. Patten were lies out of the whole cloth, and he said if I had desired to find out the truth about the commission that I could have come to him and he would have told me. Mr. Chairman, what do you think of that? [Applause.]

I have always understood that it was just as illogical and would be as futile to go to a person charged with wrong doing, whether he was a Member of Congress or not, in order to get the true facts—the true, burning, living facts—about charges made against him as it would be to take a trip to heaven to hunt devils or to hell to find saints. [Laughter and applause.]

The gentleman from New York in his speech took up the immaterial things set forth in my remarks, and dwelt at great length upon them; he attempted in that way to muddy the waters, and from the way the Republicans of the House applauded him you would have thought he was making a great hit; that he was declaring gospel truths, when, in fact, he only attacked the immaterial matters contained in my speech. For instance, he asked me if Mr. Patten said there was a steering committee connected with the Immigration Commission. I had said in my remarks that there was a steering committee in connection with this commission, and when I replied that he did, he said that was a lie out of the whole cloth, that he had never heard of such a thing as a steering committee in connection with the commission, and he dwelt at considerable length upon the subject and received considerable applause from the Republicans of the House. What are executive committees? Are they not steering committees directing the action of the body of which they are a part? Are they not created solely for that purpose? There is an executive committee in connection with this Immigration Commission, and Mr. BENNET of New York is a member of it, and when he charged that the suggestion of a steering committee in connection with the commission was false he was simply quibbling and trying to lead the minds of his hearers away from the real truth upon the subject.

Why, sir, the Committee on Rules of this House is nothing more nor less than a steering committee, that directs the procedure of the House. It is the steering committee of the House, and every attempt to deny it is an attempt to evade the truth; and when Members try to evade the truth, they are not worthy of consideration, in the House or out of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

But the gentleman from New York tried to create the impression that the commission while abroad worked, worked, worked overtime; that they severed their connection with the Union and worked overtime until they were so completely exhausted that they actually fell asleep. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, that was an effort to create the impression that the commission was hard at work all the time it was abroad. I had denounced the trip as being for fun, and I am going to prove before I get through that they did have some fun [laughter], and that was the main thing for which they went abroad. [Laughter and applause.]

In regard to that falling-asleep business, Mr. Chairman, I want to say that I have seen men fall asleep who had not toiled long and arduously [laughter]; something that they had taken at the dinner table seemed to make them drowsy, and they sometimes get sleepy from atmospheric conditions. I am of the opinion that one of those things had more to do with putting the members of the commission to sleep than the work they did, and that the gentleman from New York knows it. [Laughter and applause.] He said when he was in Rome that he was so hard at work that he did not have time to cast his eyes upon the great St. Peter's. [Laughter.] He said that when he was in the gay city of Paris he did not have time to see any of its beauties, and he tried to convey the idea that he hardly had time to draw a good long breath, and that the only thing that kept him there overnight was that he could not get a train out of the city; and the next time he was there that he only remained about two hours, and that he had the record of having made the two shortest trips to Paris that any American on earth had made.

Gentlemen, that remark was only characteristic of the extravagance of the gentleman's remarks throughout his speech, and he had no evidence whatever of a truthful character to show that a thousand Americans had not made shorter trips to Paris than he; and yet when he made that statement it received Republican applause, when every Member that applauded him knew there was no truthful foundation upon which his statement could rest.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I ask that the gentleman's last words be taken down, in which he said that every man in the House——

Mr. MACON. I said every Member who applauded; not every man in the House.

Mr. BENNET of New York. His words in which he said every man in the House knew there was no truth or foundation in that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the words be taken down.

Mr. MACON. I withdraw the words. I do not want to quibble, and will withdraw them rather than have an argument.

Mr. GAINES. I raise the point of order that the gentleman can not proceed in this manner, as the gentleman from Arkansas has, and every time he transgresses the rule and the dignity and order of the House then say "I withdraw it," and go on in the same manner.

Mr. MACON. I can not do any more than withdraw what I said.

Mr. GAINES. I myself, if the point of order is withdrawn by anyone, will renew it. I demand that his words be taken down. My point of order is that, under the rule, the gentleman should immediately take his seat and not proceed unless the House permits him to do it.

Mr. JAMES. I move that the gentleman from Arkansas be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, that seems——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has demanded that these words be taken down.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And the gentleman from Arkansas withdrew the words.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is raised whether he can withdraw them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is no question about his withdrawing them, is there?

Mr. GAINES. My point of order is that he can not keep on repeating words that are clearly out of order, and then simply withdraw them.

Mr. JAMES. The words certainly do not hurt anybody when they are withdrawn, do they?

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I am not questioning the propriety of withdrawing the language. My proposition is that when the gentleman has transgressed the order and rules of the House and is called to order, he may not proceed unless he is permitted to do so by a vote of the committee.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and the gentleman from Kentucky is recognized to make that motion.

Mr. JAMES. I move that the gentleman from Arkansas be allowed to proceed in order. That motion is certainly in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist that the words be taken down?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Since the gentleman from Arkansas has withdrawn them, I have no objection to withdrawing the demand.

Mr. GAINES. Then, I renew the demand.

Mr. JAMES. And I renew my motion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri will state his point.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I make this parliamentary inquiry, whether the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is not a proper motion to be put?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to put it. The Chair will read the rule:

If a Member is called to order for words spoken in debate, the Member calling him to order shall indicate the words excepted to, and they shall be taken down in writing at the Clerk's desk and read aloud to the House; but he shall not be held to answer, nor be subject to the censure of the House therefor, if further debate or other business has intervened.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I make the point of order that neither the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] nor the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] indicated the words which they desired to have taken down.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes; they did.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] rose immediately after the words were spoken, and indicated the last sentence.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. He asked that the words be taken down, but he did not specify, and I appeal to the notes of the Official Reporter.

Several MEMBERS. Yes, he did.

Mr. GAINES. I say he expressed himself accurately enough. No one in the House has any doubt as to the words which were intended.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I ask that the words of the gentleman from New York, in asking that the words be taken down, be read from the notes of the Official Reporter.

Mr. JAMES. The gentleman from New York withdrew his demand, while the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. GAINES] did not specify the words, and it comes too late.

Mr. GAINES. I said that I renewed the demand made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAMES. I think the gentleman's language was that he demanded that the words be taken down without specifying the language.

Mr. GAINES. On the contrary, I said that I renewed the demand made by the gentleman from New York.

Mr. JAMES. I do not think the gentleman from West Virginia used that language.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the demand which was made by the gentleman from New York be read.

Mr. JAMES. I insist, Mr. Chairman, on my motion that the gentleman from Arkansas be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. KEIFER. But the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky is not in order until the proceeding is concluded, until the words are taken down and reported, and after that it may be in order.

Mr. JAMES. But the Chair has just ruled that the words were specified.

Mr. KEIFER. Yes; but they have not been read, and the gentleman's motion is not in order until after they have been read.

The CHAIRMAN. The words have not been read at the desk, and the Chair is trying to ascertain what they were.

Mr. JAMES. I thought the Chair had ruled that the words were specified.

The CHAIRMAN. But they have not been read at the desk. The Clerk will report the words.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I did not ask that the words used by the gentleman from Arkansas be reported, but the words used by the gentleman from New York.

The CHAIRMAN. But the Chair is proceeding under the rule. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

And yet when he got upon his feet and made that part of the statement it received Republican applause, when every man who applauded knew that there was no truthful foundation whatever upon which it could rest.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the words are not objectionable and that the gentleman from Arkansas was in order when he made the statement.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I still insist on my point of order that the words of the gentleman from New York be read.

Mr. JAMES. I move that the gentleman from Arkansas be permitted to proceed in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. And I make the point of order that the words are not out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion now in order is, if it is desired to make it, that the committee rise and report the words to the House.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, in a spirit of fairness, I ask that the words of the gentleman from New York be read, in which he made the demand of the House.

Mr. ROBINSON. And I make the point of order that the words are not out of order, and that the gentleman from Arkansas did not proceed out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. That is not for the Chair to determine, but for the House to determine.

Mr. JAMES. I make the point of order that it is not in order to move that the words be taken down after the gentleman from Arkansas has withdrawn them.

The CHAIRMAN. But the demand that they be taken down was made before they were withdrawn.

Mr. JAMES. The demand was not made by the gentleman from West Virginia before the gentleman from Arkansas withdrew the words.

Mr. KEIFER. The demand had been made before they were withdrawn, and then the gentleman from West Virginia renewed the demand as quick as he could.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York first made the demand, and then it was renewed by the gentleman from West Virginia. Does the gentleman from Missouri ask that the words of the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] be read?

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. I do ask that they be read.

The official reporter read as follows:

Mr. BENNET of New York. I ask that the gentleman's last words be taken down in which he said every man in the House——

Mr. MACON. I said every Member who applauded; not every man in the House. I said everybody that applauded.

Mr. BENNET of New York. His words in which he said every man in the House knew there was no truth or foundation in that statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks that the words be taken down.

Mr. MACON. I withdraw the words. I do not want to quibble.

Mr. GAINES. I raise the point of order that the gentleman can not proceed in this manner, as the gentleman from Arkansas has, and every time he transgresses the rule and the dignity and order of the House then say "I withdraw it," and go on in the same manner.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the language used by the gentleman from Arkansas are not the words that the gentleman from New York asked to have taken down. The gentleman from Arkansas said that "every man who applauded knew" so and so, and the gentleman from New York asked to have the words taken down, "and every man in the House knew," and so forth, an entirely different statement.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is not necessary that the words be specified verbatim.

Mr. KEIFER. The gentleman from Missouri seems to think that the words must be repeated word for word and syllable for syllable.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it would not be necessary for the gentleman from New York to state the exact language, but to so state it so that it can be identified.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Mr. Chairman, just one word on my point of order. The gentleman from Arkansas said that these people who applauded might be a small number, and the gentleman from New York said "every man in the House," which is altogether a different thing and not substantially the same at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that it is not what the gentleman from New York said, but what the gentleman from Arkansas said.

Mr. SHACKLEFORD. Oh, yes; you can not take down anything except what the gentleman from New York asks to have taken down. He asks that certain words be taken down, and those words he asks to be taken down were not the words uttered by the gentleman from Arkansas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asked that the last words of the gentleman from Arkansas be taken down, and those were the words taken down, and it was not necessary to mention those words verbatim, but simply to describe them——

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PERKINS. I rise to demand the regular order. The discussion between the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHACKLEFORD] and the Chairman, however interesting, is entirely out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that the regular order was the disposition of this matter, which the committee has ordered to be taken down.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, precisely; and the motion I suggest to the Chair before the committee is the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], that the gentleman from Arkansas be allowed to proceed in order, on which it seems to me the committee should vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hold that it was in order for the committee to vote to rise and report the words to the House, and that is the only motion that is now in order.

Mr. FLOYD of Arkansas. No such motion has been made.

The CHAIRMAN. And no such motion having been made——

Mr. JAMES. In that view, Mr. Chairman, then my motion is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. No such motion has been made, and the Chair will entertain the motion that the gentleman be allowed to proceed in order. The question, therefore, is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, that the gentleman from Arkansas be allowed to proceed in order.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas will proceed in order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I do not plead guilty to having transgressed the rules of the House in any sense of the word. I withdrew, or said I would withdraw, what I said, because I did not care to take up the time of the House with quibbling. I recognize my responsibility here too well to want to fool with foolishness, to try to make capital out of nothing, or to engage in child's play when we ought to be discharging the full duties of full-grown men. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman tried to convey the idea that while the Immigration Commission was abroad it was so engrossed with its labors investigating immigration conditions in foreign countries for the purpose of bettering immigration conditions in this country that it did not have time to have any fun at all. The gentleman from New York practically said that he did not have time to look upon the great St. Peters, and did not have time to say anything or see anything in Paris; but, Mr. Chairman, let us see whether they had time, or any member of the commission had time, to see anything anywhere else or to take part in any sort of amusements or pleasures or entertainment while abroad.

I noticed in an article in one of the papers of the city of New York, published on the 7th day of September, 1907, that among other things said about the Immigration Commission's trip abroad, the following language was employed, which has not been denied up to this time that I have heard of, as much given to denying facts as the gentleman from New York seems to be:

Representative WILLIAM S. BENNET, of New York, and Mrs. Bennet, who returned from Europe yesterday by White Star steamer Cedric, had some interesting experiences while abroad. Mr. BENNET was a member of a committee that investigated immigration conditions in Europe and Asia Minor. While in Turkey a call was made upon the Sultan—

You all remember that old Sultan [laughter and applause], whose public life was so corrupt and whose private life was so dissolute that he was driven from the throne.

A MEMBER. It was not the Sultan of Sulu?

Mr. MACON. No; Abdul Hamid.

The Turkish ruler was very courteous—

This same old Abdul Hamid, now deposed—and decorated Mrs. Bennet with the insignia of the Order of Kindness, an ancient Turkish society. This medal is in the shape of a five-pointed star, with a diamond in the center. It is inlaid with enamel and studded with rubies.

Mr. Chairman, is it reasonable to believe that the gentleman's statement was entirely correct when he said that he was so engrossed in his duties as an immigration commissioner, investigating immigration conditions while abroad, that he could not take time to look upon the great cathedral of St. Peter, in Rome, or draw a good long breath or have a good sight of Paris, when we have this record of his remaining long enough in Turkey to deal with and cultivate the attention and good will of old Abdul Hamid [laughter and applause], until he felt called upon to decorate Mrs. Bennet, the companion of the distinguished gentleman from New York, with the Order of Kindness, and placing diamonds upon her breast. [Laughter and applause.]

I want to say that, in my humble judgment, the gentleman either had time to look upon St. Peters or draw a good breath in Paris, or else he willfully neglected his duties as commissioner in Turkey in order to engage in such sumptuous and decorative entertainments as this. [Laughter.] But the gentleman says that they did not have any junket abroad. He took quite an offense at what I said about a junket, Mr. Chairman, the definition that Webster gives of a "junket" is, "A feasting by public officials at the expense of the government." [Laughter and applause.] That is a junket. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that the records on file in the Treasury Department in this city show that he junketed to the extent that he had himself entertained at hotels, at the Waldorf-Astoria, at $6 a day, in this country, and hotels abroad that stood as well or as high or higher than does the Waldorf-Astoria in this country, and from the record the commission's expense account discloses that they had charges for railroads and steamships, fees and tips, hotel bills, carriages, telegrams, wines, whiskies, cognac, mineral waters, lemonade, glacé, pills, siphons, citrons, cleaning and pressing clothes, shaves, shines, hair cuts, shampoos, and rubs. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the record shows that they had these wines, whiskies, lemonades, and other luxuries throughout Europe, and that the auditor saw fit to allow them as necessaries, but he refused to allow for the shines, shaves, shampoos, rubs, and so forth, on the theory that it was graft and that he could not afford to stand for graft by public officials, and yet the gentleman says their trip abroad was not a junket. [Laughter.] Mr. Chairman, the tips I speak of, in so far as the gentleman from New York is concerned, are rich. The commission had a meeting and agreed on tips on a 10 per cent basis, but the coxcomb member of the commission was not willing to allow it to stand at that, and complained in regard to it, and said that he had a position in connection with his appointment as a commissioner and as a Member of Congress to sustain, and he raised the tip price and put it at about 25 per cent. In other words, the gentleman was trying to sustain the dignity of a Member of the American Congress and a member of the Immigration Commission by the tip route.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York indicated that the commission had no time for pleasure, that he did not even see the Appian Way, but the commission seems to have seen something else. [Laughter.] And he was a member of it, and so I charge it to the commission. Their accounts contain many charges for carriages and they were all allowed. They were all certified to by the chairman of the commission as correct, and all admitted by the auditor to have been for official business. Some of them are amusing, as I think you will conclude. I find here a carriage trip to Bethany from Jerusalem. [Laughter.] Did you ever hear of any immigration coming to this country from Bethany that would be poisonous or deleterious to the social conditions of this country. [Laughter.] I never did, and yet they took a business trip to Bethany to investigate immigration conditions, or else they did it for pleasure, and if they took it for pleasure, then it was at the expense of the Government, and they had no more right to do it than I have to take a hack ride in this city at the expense of the Government if I should care to ride over it for pleasure.

They had a trip to Bethlehem from Jerusalem to investigate immigration conditions; a carriage journey to Joppa to investigate immigration conditions; a carriage trip to the ambassador's and return in London to investigate immigration conditions in that august embassy; a trip to the House of Lords. Gentlemen, do you think it necessary to go to the House of Lords to investigate immigration conditions? [Laughter.] If you do, then I do not understand why we should not throw the gates wide open and permit citizens from every country to come to our shores if we are going to permit members of the House of Lords to come. [Laughter.] They went there for the purpose of investigating these lordly gentlemen in order to benefit immigration conditions in this country, of course.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman allow me a question there?

Mr. MACON. Wait until I get through with this enumeration. They had a carriage ride to the Lake of Killarney.

Mr. BENNET of New York. I would like to ask if the gentleman charges I took that ride?

Mr. MACON. I charge that the commission did. Is the gentleman a member of it?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I never was in Ireland in my life.

Mr. MACON. And did not take any wine while abroad, I suppose?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Never.

Mr. MACON. It is charged up in your bill on file in the Treasury Department.

Mr. BENNET of New York. Unquestionably it is; and I will tell you just where it came. In the Sicilian trip, where I paid all the bills for all the party, consisting of Mr. BURNETT——

Mr. MACON. You took wine also; did you not?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I did not.

Mr. MACON. Did you drink anything at all?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I paid for it, but did not drink any.

Mr. MACON. You paid for it out of the commission's money?

Mr. BENNET of New York. I certainly did.

Mr. MACON. When did you become an abstainer?

Mr. BENNET of New York. Thirty-nine years ago. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. MACON. Well, let us see about that. Let me read from the New York Sun of March 30, 1900, and see whether or not the gentleman is a teetotaler; the article is headed "Liberal William and the Liberal Sunday:"

Another day star has fallen from the firmament; another light-ship has gone ashore on the coast of reform; another beacon in the pathway of purity has been quenched. We hate to admit it. We have suppressed the fact as long as we could; but we can do no more. The Hon. WILLIAM S. BENNET, "Our Billy," has gone over to the demon rum. The white ribbon is trailing in the mud—there is the sound of ribaldry in every Raines law hotel. Even in the Republican county committee headquarters beneath the marble tower that tops the skies there is the sound of unrestrained weeping. No more tea parties with "Beautiful Billy" to pour; no more of those sweetly instructive "at homes" of the Hon. HERBERT PARSONS. A pillar of the community has been wrenched from its foundations and another shorn Samson goes to his ruin, while the temple of teetotalism trembles to its base. * * * Our friend has fallen off the water wagon!

[Laughter.]

It is not an unheard-of thing. Other people have had a similar experience. Here it is almost the 1st of April; and that is a respectable period for any New Year's resolution to persist.

[Laughter and applause.]

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York attempts to convey the idea that he did not take wine when he was abroad, because he quit thirty-nine years ago, but here is a statement saying that he fell off the water wagon only last year. [Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. BENNET of New York rose.

Mr. MACON. I decline to yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. MACON. I thought I was doing that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that personalities of that sort from a newspaper should not be used in that way.

Mr. JAMES. That was a pleasantry, not a personality.

Mr. MACON. Goodness alive! I am not offering anything offensive, I hope. I was only reading an article from a Republican paper about a Republican falling off of a water wagon. But back to the joy rides. They had a carriage to the castles at Edinburgh, a carriage to Westminster Abbey, a carriage to the Tower of London, a cab to Regent Square, and a cab to the British Museum.

I wonder if they were trying to investigate immigration conditions in Westminster Abbey or in the British Museum. [Laughter.]

In Siracusa we find "a carriage ride to the catacombs," Mr. Chairman, a place that is filled with dead men's bones which are decaying hour by hour [laughter] and the stench that arises from them, if long endured, will produce certain death. Yet the commission was investigating immigration conditions among those dead bones that are giving forth such a stench that would ordinarily drive a hyena to his hole.

Ah, do you think, sir, that the commission was in an honest discharge of its duties in the matter of investigating immigration conditions when its members were taking these joy rides? No man who has a reverence for the truth will insist that they were.

But, O Mr. Chairman, there are so many things here that can be shown by the records, and I will say, in passing, that I have introduced a resolution calling for an investigation of the expenditures of this commission that took $90,000 with them when they went upon the European trip, only $20,675 of which has been accounted for in their reports. We would like to know what became of the balance of that $90,000, and we would like to know the nature of the many other extravagant expenditures that have been made by the commission; $667,992.67 spent, and nothing to show for it except four or five little reports that do not amount to a bill of beans, the greater part of the information contained in them having been copied from something that had already been written and said upon the immigration question, and therefore they are nothing more or less than plagiarism in the true sense of the word, and not based upon an intelligent investigation of immigration conditions by this commission.

But from what the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET] said the other day, one would naturally conclude that he was a friend to the cause of immigration reform conditions in this country, and I thought from what he said that he was in favor of the $4 head tax, because he said that the commission was responsible for the legislation that provided for it, and that they had brought so many millions of dollars into the country by reason of their recommendations, to offset the expenditures that they had made, that the country was financially much better off than it would have been if the commission had not been created.

But let us see what the gentleman says upon that subject in a letter written to New York about the time the commission was created. Let us see if he is a friend to the conditions as they exist in this country under the law, or whether he is not seeking to destroy the law and to help to pollute the social conditions of the country by bringing in a class of immigration that can not come here under any sort of decent law. I read, Mr. Chairman, from a letter written from this city on February 19, 1907, just the day before the immigration law was approved that created the commission; it is directed to the Liberal Immigration League, 150 Nassau street, New York:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, February 19, 1907.

LIBERAL IMMIGRATION LEAGUE,
150 Nassau Street, New York, N. Y.

GENTLEMEN: Referring again to your kind invitation to be present at the mass meeting to be held under the auspices of your league on the 22d instant, would say that I find that, owing to the engrossing nature of my duties here, I shall be unable to be present. I am more than pleased to have been able to report from the conference committee so moderate a bill as that which has just passed Congress.

Actually, through the bonding privilege, people who are now being rejected daily, because of poor physique, low vitality, or liability to become public charges, can, after this law takes effect, be admitted, so that the campaign of the restrictionists has ended in a bill under which persons who can not be admitted under existing law, can, after this new law takes effect, be admitted.

And no additional persons, other than epileptics, certain classes of insane persons, and a certain class of contract laborers will be excluded.

A confession, Mr. Chairman, that under the new law a class of people can be brought into this country who will become obnoxious, poisonous to the society of it, who will become a charge upon the Government, a charge upon the burden-bearing citizens of this country from one end of it to the other, a pollution of the happy social conditions of which we are so justly proud and jealous.

In regard to the head tax of $4, it is without justification, but it will be an irritation and not a restriction.

If we had not accepted it, we probably could not have obtained a bill, and thus have been deprived of the bonding clause.

I should advise that your league continue. The increased head tax is worth protesting against, and, in addition to that, notice was publicly given on the floor of the House that the restrictionists intend to continue their campaign, with the idea of getting the educational test in the Sixtieth Congress.

If the restrictionists continue their campaign, you ought to continue yours, and I can not speak too highly of the work of your league during this Congress, without which it is quite certain there would have been an educational test upon the statute books to-day, thus excluding yearly about 200,000 deserving immigrants.

Regretting my inability to attend, and wishing you every success in your efforts, I am,

Very truly, yours,
WILLIAM S. BENNET,
Member Immigration Commission.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. PERKINS. I rise because I wish to take the liberty of suggesting that the time of the gentleman from Arkansas has expired.

Mr. MACON. Oh, no; I lost fifteen minutes by debate over words spoken by me and complained of by Members on the other side of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. That was chargeable to the gentleman's time. They have four hours on the Democratic side, and they can use it in any way they see fit. If the gentleman from Arkansas desired to use it up by having rulings made on his remarks, that is his business. Surely it must come out of the gentleman's time if it comes out of the four hours.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, surely the time taken up in wrangling about a parliamentary situation is not to be taken out of the time of the gentleman from Arkansas or the time of the gentleman from Georgia, who manages the bill on this side of the House, or out of the eight hours for general debate.

Mr. PERKINS. It was a wrangle growing out of remarks made by the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. GAINES. And remarks which the gentleman from Arkansas himself deemed improper by withdrawing them.

Mr. HOWARD. And after they were withdrawn the gentleman from West Virginia undertook to retain them before the House in a contention which consumed the most of the time. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman from Georgia is very much mistaken. I did not undertake to retain them.

Mr. HOWARD. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say to the gentleman from West Virginia that he misstates facts when he says that I thought the words were improper. I said that I would withdraw them because I wanted to avoid a quibble and a squabble.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will suspend until the Chair rules upon the point of order made by the gentleman from New York. The Chair immediately upon the parliamentary situation being concluded deducted the time that was consumed, and there are remaining now to the gentleman from Arkansas six minutes.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the gentleman from New York took some exception the other day to my making an attack upon a Member of Congress without hunting up evidence before I proceeded that could be proven even to the point of the crossing of every "t" and the dotting of every "i" in the information that I presented and based my charges upon. Upon what meat have Congressmen fed that they have grown so great that they can not afford to be questioned? I remember to have read that a Member of Congress from the State from which the gentleman comes was charged with a felony while a Member of this House and escaped upon a plea of the statute of limitations. I remember to have read that two Congressmen from the State of Oregon were indicted for felonies, one of them tried and convicted, and the other, though not tried and convicted up to the time his term of office expired, is standing trial at this moment upon the charge.

I remember to have read that a Senator who had served the State of Oregon thirty long years was indicted for a felony, and died, figuratively speaking, between the court-house and the penitentiary, he having been convicted of the charge. I remember to have read that a Senator from the State of Nebraska was indicted for a felony while a Member of Congress, but escaped punishment by entering a plea of the statute of limitations. I remember that a Senator from the State of Kansas, while a Member of Congress, was indicted for a felony, convicted, and served his time in a felon's cell; and all of these gentlemen that I have mentioned belonged to the same party, were of the same political household and faith of the gentleman from New York. With that record standing boldly forth, am I not justified in concluding that perhaps a Congressman, even a Republican Congressman, can do something wrong that he can be charged with by a Member of Congress? Ah, Mr. Chairman, the fact that an individual is elected to the Congress of the United States is not conclusive evidence of his integrity, nor does it make him immune from attack. In the matter of wrongdoing he stands upon the same plane that the humblest human beings that ever breathed the breath of life occupy. An election to Congress no more makes a man sacred than does the simple election of a man to the office of justice of the peace endow the justice of the peace with a full and complete knowledge of all the law of the land, whether enacted by legislatures or parliaments or other lawmaking bodies, including the courts.

The information that I predicated my speech upon the other day was furnished me by the secretary of a secretary of an immigration league, and I want to say that, in my judgment, a thousand per cent more Congressmen of the other House and of this have been indicted for felonies, convicted, and have served times as felons than have immigration secretaries. And that being the case, I respectfully refer the history of the case to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BENNET], and ask him if I could not afford to use the facts given to me by an honorable secretary of an immigration society, in view of the fact that none of them have ever stood trial for felony, that none of them have ever been indicted, while Congressmen have been both indicted and convicted. Now, Mr. Chairman, a few words about the extravagance of this commission. They have over 200 persons in their employ, their salaries ranging all the way from $40 a month for a janitor to $28 a day for a detective to nose around over the country and get secret information about this, that, or the other thing; secret information about the farmers of the South, who perhaps may not have lived up to every contract exactly as somebody else might have them live up to them, but who live up to their contracts as completely and as perfectly as do the citizens of any other quarter of this Union, and any reflection or aspersion that is attempted to be cast upon them by appointing peonage detectives to go among them and nose around about their business is disgusting and repulsive to any decent and fair-minded man on earth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MACON. I will ask the gentleman from Georgia to grant me a little more time.

Mr. HOWARD. The remaining hour has been assigned to the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN].

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Chairman, I will ask the gentleman from Georgia to yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. HOWARD. I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Arkansas.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, this commission had in its employ 200 people, and they received salaries, as I said, all the way from $40 a month for a janitor to $28 a day, many of them receiving in addition to their salaries their actual traveling expenses, and as high as $3.50 a day in addition thereto in lieu of subsistence. You will find by investigating the records that there has been a wholesale expenditure of the money of the people by this commission in a most extravagant manner.

But they say, Mr. Chairman, that it has been spent in the interest of immigration investigations. But what have they to show for it? As I have said, there are only these four or five little reports, about 5 by 8 inches in dimension, and containing from 10 to 60 pages. Any immigration society could have gotten them out in less than thirty days, at an expense not exceeding $5,000 at the outside, and yet the American people are charged with this enormous expenditure, $657,992.67, and must bear the burden without a groan. I insist that the resolution that I have introduced ought to be passed, in order that an investigation of the expenditures of the commission can be had. If it has not been extravagant, let them come forth and show it. If they have been, let the American people know it, in order that the blame can be properly lodged. I also have in mind another commission—the Monetary Commission—which has the privilege, under the law, of expending every dollar they care to expend without accounting for it except in a lump sum. They are without limit and their accounts can not be questioned under the law that created the commission. The law provides that the auditor must accept every voucher of expenses that is signed by the chairman or the acting chairman without question as to amount or the object for which it was expended.

If we are to have commissions of that extravagant character in great numbers without limit upon their appropriations, with no limit to the number of people they can employ, then it will only be a question of time until the Government will be practically bankrupt. We have been substantially that way for some years past. We have been living beyond our income; we have gone beyond the realm of good statesmanship and good business judgment and business sense, and we ought to call a halt to such expenditures before it is too late. Why, sirs, Walsh, of Chicago, was only extravagant in the expenditure of trust funds; Morse, of New York, was only extravagant with the trust funds that were confided to his keeping; both high up in life, and yet one of them at this hour is serving time in the penitentiary at Atlanta and the other in the penitentiary at Leavenworth, Kans.; and unless we call a halt it will only be a question of time when commissions will go so far that they, too, will be called before the bar of justice, certainly before the bar of public opinion, and the demand made that they correct their ways, that they shall no longer extravagantly waste the people's money in the profligate way they have been doing.

Mr. Chairman, I hate graft and despise grafters and for that reason I expect to raise my voice against them every opportunity I have, and I declare an extravagant expenditure of trust funds, whether belonging to nations or individuals, to be graft pure and simple, and there is no truthful way of getting around it. I thank the House for its attention. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, assuring the House that I will not put a single unparliamentary thing in my remarks I would like to have the privilege of revising and extending them. I will not allow anything to appear in violation of the rules of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to object. The gentleman has twice been called to order, and I think under the circumstances the request should not be granted.

Mr. MACON. Mr. Chairman, I expected that much from that side of the House, but I can outlive it, thank God, and the American people will call upon you to account for your extravagances, whether you allow me to expose them in the RECORD or not.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, regular order.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. TILSON, Chairman of the Committee of Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 19255, the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—EMPLOYEES ON THE ISTHMIAN CANAL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States (S. Doc. No. 355).

The Clerk read as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I am transmitting herewith certain papers relative to the cases of Alexander Comba, Pedro Sanchez, John H. Cole, and Oscar F. Lackey, who were injured on the isthmus prior to August 1, 1908, while in the employment of the Isthmian Canal Commission.

Comba's legs were crushed, necessitating amputation, and he was still lying in the hospital nearly two years after the accident. The left arm and right hand, except the thumb, of Sanchez were amputated because of injuries received in a dynamite explosion. Cole's right hand was cut off while he was at work on a steam-shovel crane. Lackey suffered a fracture of the spine, which has permanently disqualified him from doing anything but a limited amount of light work.

In these and similar cases of injury received by employees of the commission prior to August 1, 1908, there is no authority for giving any pecuniary relief to either the employees themselves or to their families, except that each employee was entitled to and was granted, under his contract of employment, thirty days' meritorious sick leave with pay.

It needs no argument to establish the obligation which the Government of the United States is under to provide relief for its employees who are permanently disabled or maimed, and for the families of those who are thus injured or killed, through no fault of their own, while employed upon work of such hazardous character as that connected with the construction of the Isthmian Canal. This obligation is recognized by the act of May 30, 1908, and by section 8 of the Panama Canal bill (H. R. 12316) now pending before the Congress.

There are a number of bills pending before the Congress for the relief of certain employees who were injured prior to August 1, 1908, and among them a bill for the relief of Lackey. It seems right that some general law should be enacted which will enable a reasonable allowance to be made to employees who were permanently disabled or maimed and to the families of those who were killed in accidents occurring prior to that date through no fault of their own.

By the act approved May 30, 1908, the widow, children, or dependent parents of an employee killed in the course of hazardous employment are entitled to receive compensation for a year at the rate the employee was paid at the time of his death, provided a claim is filed with the Secretary of Commerce and Labor within ninety days from the date of death.

The families of employees living in foreign countries, especially the families of Spanish employees, in a number of cases were unable to file a claim within the limited time fixed. The Secretary of Commerce and Labor has therefore been compelled to disapprove a number of claims which show that the claimants were entitled to the benefits of the act. The time limit for filing such claims should be extended and the Secretary of Commerce and Labor authorized to consider and allow such claims as have heretofore been filed.

I therefore recommend that suitable legislation be enacted authorizing the Secretary of Commerce and Labor to act upon any claims for compensation on account of death which have heretofore been filed under the act approved May 30, 1908, and that authority be given the President, under such restrictions as the Congress may deem advisable, to settle all claims on account of the death or permanent disability or maiming of employees of the Isthmian Canal Commission caused by accidents on the Isthmus of Panama prior to August 1, 1908, for which such employees were not responsible.

A draft of a bill, substantially following the Panama Canal bill now pending, which I believe will meet the requirements of the situation has been prepared by the Secretary of War and is at the disposition of Congress.

WM. H. TAFT.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 8, 1910.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, so much of this message as refers to claims of individuals will be referred to the Committee on Claims, and so much as refers to legislation will be referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE presented a resolution adopted by General Lander Post, No. 5, Grand Army of the Republic, Department of Massachusetts, of Lynn, Mass., which was referred to the Committee on the Library and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

HEADQUARTERS GENERAL LANDER POST 5,
GRAND ARMY OF THE REPUBLIC,
Lynn, Mass., February 3, 1910.

At a regular meeting of the post, held this evening, the following preamble and resolution was unanimously adopted:

Whereas it has come to our notice that the Commonwealth of Virginia has sent a statue of Robert E. Lee to the statuary room of the Capitol at Washington, a building which he would probably have destroyed had his forces captured the city at the time of Early's raid; and

Whereas the act of Congress under which Virginia seeks to place the statue was enacted in 1864, when the Nation was exerting all its power to defend itself against the assaults of Lee; and

Whereas to place the statue of one who, having held the responsible position of Adjutant-General of the Army of the United States, deserted to the enemies and led them through four years of bloody war would be contrary to the spirit of the act under which it is sought to honor a traitor; and

Whereas we believe that it would be an insult to the memory of the men who gave their lives for their country, and the Union veterans who survived the war, and who still cherish a love for the flag they fought under, to place the statue of Robert E. Lee, in the full uniform of a rebel general, in the Hall of Fame, as it would teach coming generations that the man who fought to destroy the country deserves the highest honors the Nation can bestow: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we protest most emphatically against the proposed outrage and urge our Senators and Representatives in Congress to use their most earnest endeavors to prevent the acceptance of the statue by the Government, and to secure its removal from the Capitol, where it has been placed without authority.

The adjutant was instructed to mail a copy to our Senators and Representatives in Congress.

Official.

JOHN ANDERSON, Adjutant.

Mr. MARTIN. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. 5522) to authorize the reconstruction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the Black River near Paroquet, Ark.; the bill (S. 5523) to authorize the reconstruction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the St. Francis River near Parkin, Ark.; and the bill (S. 5524) to authorize the reconstruction, maintenance, and operation of a bridge across the White River at Augusta, Ark., were passed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

Mr. MARTIN. I move that the House be requested to return the bills to the Senate, as they are identical with House bills just reported by me.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BURKETT, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4629) to authorize the surveyor of the District of Columbia to adopt the system of designating land in the District of Columbia now in force in the office of the assessor of said District, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 204) thereon.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. 4477) providing for the homestead entry of certain lands in the State of Washington, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 206) thereon.

COMMANDER ROBERT E. PEARY.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back, with an amendment, the bill (S. 6104) providing for the appointment of Commander Robert E. Peary a rear-admiral in the navy as an additional number in grade, and placing him upon the retired list, and I ask for its present consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

The amendment was, at the end of the bill, after the word "navy," to insert the words "at the highest pay in the grade," so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Commander Robert E. Peary, of the United States Navy, a rear-admiral in the navy, to be carried as an additional number in said grade, and to place him upon the retired list of the navy at the highest pay in the grade.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INTERNATIONAL EXPOSITIONS AT ROME AND TURIN.

Mr. CULLOM. From the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back without amendment the bill (S. 6171) to provide for participation by the United States in two international expositions to be held, respectively, at Rome and Turin, Italy, in 1911; and I ask for its immediate consideration.

The Secretary read the bill; and there being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. BURKETT. There was so much noise I did not catch all of the bill. Do I understand that the one bill provides for two expositions?

Mr. CULLOM. For two expositions, one at Rome and the other at Turin, in the same country.

Mr. BURKETT. What is the occasion?

Mr. CULLOM. The fiftieth anniversary of the Kingdom, of free Italy.

Mr. BURKETT. Is there to be the same sort of an exposition at each place?

Mr. CULLOM. The same sort—agricultural, manufacturing, and so forth.

Mr. BURKETT. Is it not rather unusual to take up two expositions in one country the same year?

Mr. CULLOM. That is for them to determine.

Mr. BURKETT. There was a good deal of confusion in the Chamber. What is the limit of it? Is it simply starting it, and does this action contemplate a large outlay?

Mr. CULLOM. If the Senator will allow the bill to be read, he will see——

Mr. BURKETT. The bill was read, but there was so much confusion I did not get the amount.

Mr. CULLOM. The exposition at Rome begins in February, 1911, and the one at Turin begins in April of the same year. There is only a year in which to get ready, and it is very important that this little appropriation shall be made. Unfortunately we failed to make an appropriation for the exposition at Brussels, when Belgium has always acted very liberally toward us in making appropriations for our world's fairs.

Mr. BURKETT. I notice that the bill authorizes the Smithsonian Institute to turn over the necessary exhibits, as I understood it. Is there any limit in the bill?

Mr. CULLOM. The appropriation is $130,000 for both expositions, nothing more nor nothing less.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

USE OF FUEL OIL IN THE NAVY.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 176), which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Senate resolution 176.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to furnish to the Senate the amount in barrels of fuel oil (petroleum and naphtha) consumed by the navy on torpedo boats and torpedo-boat destroyers or other naval vessels; that he give the average cost of same for each year for the last five years; and that he state from whom it was purchased.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE-PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 18006) granting pensions and increase of pension to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the civil war, and to widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice-President appointed Mr. McCUMBER, Mr. SCOTT, and Mr. TALIAFERRO the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SECOND-CLASS MAIL MATTER.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a prior day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 170, submitted by Mr. CLAY on the 7th instant, as follows:

Senate resolution 170.

Resolved, That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative cost, in the United States, of transporting publications, designated as second-class mail by mail, express, and fast freight.

Second. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid by the United States Government and by the express companies to the principal railroad companies in the United States for similar service in transporting publications designated as second-class mail matter.

Third. That the Interstate Commerce Commission be directed to ascertain and report to the Senate the comparative rates paid to the leading railroad companies for transporting the several classes of mail of the Government of the United States, and for similar service paid by the express companies to the principal railroad companies in the United States.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

Mr. KEAN. I do not see present the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads. I thought he desired to have both resolutions submitted by the Senator from Georgia referred to the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. President, I prefer to have the resolutions acted upon, because there is a resolution pending before the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads instructing the committee to find out this information, and in order to comply with the former request of the Senate, it will be necessary to secure the information sought by these resolutions.

Heretofore the Senate adopted a resolution directing the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads to make a thorough investigation in regard to this subject. The reason for it has arisen probably from the fact that an effort is being made to increase the postage on second-class mail matter.

But, inasmuch as the chairman of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads is absent from the Senate, I will ask that the resolutions lie on the table until he returns. He objected to their consideration for a day when they were introduced, and I would not desire to press them in his absence.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolution will lie on the table, and also Senate resolution 171, of like purport.

Mr. CLAY. Let the same action be taken in regard to it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Like action will be taken in regard to resolution 171.

THE FOREST SERVICE.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a prior day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 174, submitted yesterday by Mr. HEYBURN, as follows:

Senate resolution 174.

Resolved, That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby directed to furnish to the Senate a statement as to the amount of money expended under the direction of the Forester in the education of forest students, the institution they attended, the names of such students, and whether or not their transportation to and from these institutions and their salaries were paid during their attendance.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

INCOME TAX.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a resolution coming over from a prior day, which will be read.

The Secretary read Senate resolution 175, submitted yesterday by Mr. BORAH, as follows:

Senate resolution 175.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be, and is hereby, directed to report to the Senate as early as may be practicable whether, in the opinion of the committee, the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as submitted to the States for ratification at the special session, would, if adopted, authorize Congress to lay a tax upon incomes derived from state bonds and other municipal securities or would authorize Congress to tax the instrumentalities or means and property of the State or the salary of state officers.

Mr. BORAH. I ask that the resolution may be passed over.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. At the request of the Senator from Idaho, the resolution will lie on the table.

INCREASED COST OF LIVING.

Mr. KEAN. I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of Senate resolution 165, reported yesterday from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from New Jersey asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not object to the consideration.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. There are several committee amendments which should first be adopted. Does the Senator from Missouri desire those to be acted on before he addresses the Senate?

Mr. STONE. I have no objection.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the committee amendments in their order.

The SECRETARY. The amendments reported by the Committee on Finance are, on page 2, line 1, after the word "wages," to strike out "and incomes" and insert "salaries and earnings;" in line 17, before the word "by," to strike out the word "legislation," and after the word "by," to insert "tariff or other legislation of;" in line 21, after the word "articles," to strike out the word "it" and insert "and the committee is also authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to make a thorough investigation of the prices of food products on the farm in various parts of the United States, the wholesale prices of such food products at the wholesale trade centers of the United States, and the retail prices of such food products in the larger cities of the United States; and also a comparative statement showing cost of production on the farm."

And on page 3, line 6, after the word "such," to strike out the words "bill or bills" and to insert "recommendations," so as to make the resolution read:

Resolved, That there shall be appointed by the President of the Senate a select committee of seven Senators, with authority to sit during the session of the Senate or during the recess of Congress, either as a committee or by a subcommittee, with instructions to make an exhaustive investigation into the cost of living and any increase in the same since 1900; to ascertain whether the price of the necessaries of life which enter into the general use and consumption of the people have, since the year 1900, been increased; and if so, to ascertain the cause or causes which have influenced said increase. In making such investigation special attention shall be given by the committee to the subject of wages, salaries, and earnings, and if the increase in the same has kept pace with the increase in the cost of living; increased price, if any, of such articles as meat, grain, provisions, rents, cotton, wool, clothing, lumber, coal, iron, oil, brick, and cement; stating in said report the price to the producer, the wholesaler or jobber, the retailer, and the consumer at which said articles included in the investigation by said committee were distributed and sold in the year 1900, and the price for their disposition and sale at the present time. It shall further be the duty of said committee to ascertain the cost of production of said articles and the cost of their distribution and sale when in the hands of the wholesaler or jobber and the retailer between the same periods. If, in the judgment of said committee, such articles have been increased in price by reason of the increased production of gold throughout the world and the expansion of the currency in the United States, or by tariff or other legislation of Congress, or by any monopoly, combination, or conspiracy to control, regulate, or restrain interstate or foreign commerce in the supply, distribution, or sale of such articles. And the committee is also authorized and directed, by subcommittee or otherwise, to make a thorough investigation of the prices of food products on the farm in various parts of the United States, the wholesale prices of such food products at the wholesale trade centers of the United States, and the retail prices of such food products in the larger cities of the United States; and also a comparative statement showing cost of production on the farm. It shall report the same to the Senate, with suggestions or recommendations as to the remedy to be applied to reduce the cost of living, and accompany its report with such recommendations as will, in the opinion of the committee, correct and remove the cause or causes which have enhanced the price of said articles. Said committee or subcommittee is authorized to employ experts, administer oaths, take testimony, send for persons and papers, employ a stenographer to report its hearings, and to have such hearings printed.

And all necessary expenses to carry out the provisions of this resolution shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Missouri has the floor.

Mr. STONE. I yield to the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. WARREN. On line 4, page 2, after the words "cotton, wool," I move to insert "hides, leather, boots and shoes."

If I may be permitted just a word, I do not wish to enter into a discussion, but I notice down below, on the same page, in line 17, a reference to "tariff or other legislation," and as there is no tariff on raw cotton, and in the last tariff act raw wool remained unchanged, while manufactures of wool were slightly reduced in two instances, it seems to me that the item of boots and shoes, which enters so largely into the clothing of the American people and upon which the reduction of the tariff was greater than upon almost any other commodity, should be included. Hides being made free, leather being reduced 75 per cent in some grades and 60 per cent in others, harness being reduced more than one-half, and boots and shoes from 25 to 10 per cent, I think the words "hides, leather, boots and shoes" ought to be included.

I should like this committee to ascertain why, with free hides and greatly reduced rates on products of hides, prices thereof have not been reduced. As a matter of fact, prices of hides, leather, harness, saddles, and boots and shoes have been greatly advanced.

Mr. KEAN. I have no objection to the amendment.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment submitted by the Senator from Wyoming.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 4, after the word "wool," insert the words "hides, leather, boots and shoes."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask the Senator from New Jersey reporting the resolution why only specific articles are included in it? Why is not the committee authorized to investigate the price of commodities generally?

Mr. KEAN. The resolution was not originally drawn by the Senator from New Jersey. It was drawn by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] and reported with amendments from the Finance Committee. It was then referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and it has been reported favorably from that committee.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. It would be much stronger if it included all commodities.

Mr. BURTON. I suggest an amendment, which is a very simple one.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield for that purpose?

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not think I have any objection to perfecting the resolution before I address myself to it. I am perfectly willing to yield the floor until that is done, if it is desired by Senators.

Mr. BURTON. I will state to the Senator from Missouri that I understood he was retaining the floor merely with a view of speaking after amendments to perfect the text of the resolution have been presented.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, for the purpose of perfecting the resolution, if it is the pleasure of Senators, I will surrender the floor for the present.

Mr. BURTON. Then I suggest an amendment. In line 3, page 2, after the word "of," I move to insert "commodities including."

Mr. KEAN. There is no objection to that, Mr. President.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment submitted by the Senator from Ohio.

The SECRETARY. On page 2, line 3, after the word "of," where it occurs the second time, insert the words "commodities including," so as to read:

Of commodities including such articles as meat, grain, provisions—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OVERMAN. I move to add, after the word "cement," in line 5, page 2, the words "farming implements."

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. In line 5, page 2, before the word "cement," strike out the word "and," and after the word "cement" insert "and farming implements."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, I wish to know whether these special amendments which are being offered in any way limit the scope of the investigation. My idea of the resolution, derived from hearing it read, was that it was intended that this committee should inquire into the rise of prices in this country, and that they were not limited to any particular investigation, and when words were inserted mentioning specific articles it was intended to be directory to that particular subject, but not to exclude the committee from considering others. I should like to have a ruling on that point. I should like to know what the Chair would rule on it.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator think that is a parliamentary inquiry which the Chair should answer?

Mr. MONEY. I think it is a parliamentary inquiry, because I want to know the effect of naming of specific articles upon the scope of the investigation. If it shall limit the committee in any respect, I would object to any amendment whatever. Although I think all the articles mentioned should be examined into, they should be examined into along the line with everything else.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair hardly thinks that it is a parliamentary inquiry, but the Chair is entirely willing to give his judgment.

Mr. MONEY. I should like to have the judgment of the Chair upon the question.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The resolution contains the word "commodities," a pretty broad-meaning word. The Chair does not understand that it is the intention of those proposing amendments to limit the scope of the resolution but rather to direct especially the attention of the committee having the matter in charge to those particular subjects.

Mr. MONEY. I had that opinion myself, Mr. President, but I want the expression of others. When you have expressed something it might exclude some word not mentioned. I am glad the Chair has expressed his opinion in that way, because in my opinion it is a useless investigation that does not touch everything that commends itself to the committee having the subject in charge.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, I did not intend to say a word on the resolution, but on the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi I would make a remark for his consideration. Does not the enumeration mean the exclusion, and where a general word is followed by specifications, is not that general word modified by those specifications? I merely make this suggestion so that it can be on the record.

I rise to another——

Mr. HEYBURN. I wish to offer an amendment to the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Indiana has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Certainly. I rose to a question of the order of business, and will state it as soon as the Senator gets through.

Mr. HEYBURN. I move to amend the resolution on page 1, line 1, after the word "That," by striking out "there shall be appointed by the President of the Senate a select committee of seven Senators, with authority to sit during the session of the Senate or during the recess of Congress, either as a committee or by a subcommittee, with instructions," and inserting in lieu thereof the words "the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be instructed," so that it will read: "That the Secretary of Commerce and Labor be instructed to make an exhaustive investigation," and so forth. Then, whenever the word "committee" occurs, I move to strike out that word and insert the word "Secretary;" on page 2, to strike out after the word "periods," in line 14, down to and including the word "articles" in line 21; and then in line 22, page 2, to strike out the words "by subcommittee or otherwise."

I also move, in line 3, page 3, to strike out the word "It" and substitute "He;" in line 7, page 3, to strike out the word "committee" and substitute "Secretary;" and to strike out all after the word "articles," in line 9, down to the end of the resolution, so that it will provide that the Secretary of Commerce and Labor shall perform the things proposed by the resolution to be performed by a committee.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. On page 1, line 1, after the word "That," strike out down to and including the words "with instructions," in line 5, and insert "Secretary of Commerce and Labor be instructed." Wherever the word "committee" appears in the resolution substitute the word "Secretary;" on page 2, line 14, strike out, beginning with the word "If," down to and including the word "articles," in line 21; and in line 22 in the committee amendment strike out the words "subcommittee or otherwise;" on page 3, line 3, strike out the word "It" and insert in lieu thereof the word "He;" and on page 3, line 9, beginning with the word "Said," strike out the remainder of the resolution.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN].

Mr. ELKINS. I object to the amendment.

Mr. HEYBURN. What is the question which is being presented, Mr. President?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HEYBURN. Are there other amendments pending?

The VICE-PRESIDENT. No; all the other amendments have been voted upon.

Mr. HEYBURN. Then I will say a few words in explanation of the amendment.

Mr. President, I see no reason for appointing a committee to do that for which provision has already been made by general law. When the Department of Commerce and Labor was created, it was urged that it was to furnish Congress with just such information as is called for in this case. That department is maintained at very great expense. The committee will undoubtedly go right to that department to get this information; and the department has the information on hand, or, if it has it not up to date, it can procure it more readily, with the vast resources at its command, than any committee could procure it. I offer this as a suggestion.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senate, I want to call the attention of Senators, and especially the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER], to the order of business. I do so at this moment because there are so many Senators here, and of course I do it, as I say, with the consent of the Senate. Many days ago, immediately after the Alaska government bill was made the unfinished business, the postal savings-bank bill was brought in, and it was agreed that the unfinished business should be laid aside from day to day until a reasonable time had elapsed to bring a vote on the postal savings-bank bill. Some time has elapsed. So far as the committee in charge of the unfinished business is concerned, it is perfectly willing, with the consent of the Senate, of course, which controls all these things, that the unfinished business shall still be laid aside from day to day, so that plenty of time may be had to pass the postal savings-bank bill. But I think it advisable to say to the Senator from Montana that, after what has seemed to all to be a reasonable time has elapsed for the consideration of the postal savings-bank bill, the committee in charge of the unfinished business would like to proceed with its consideration, of course with the consent of the Senate. I am, therefore, expressing the hope, Mr. President, while so many Senators are present, that the Senator from Montana will get, if he can, a day fixed for a vote upon the postal savings-bank bill, so that we may know where we are with reference to these various procedures.

I wish to say that there is no disposition, and there will be none, on the part of those who are in charge of the unfinished business to in anywise interfere with the progress of the discussion of the postal savings-bank measure. I, for one, am earnestly hopeful that it will be speeded to a conclusion; but the other matter is important also; and merely that the minds of Senators might be brought to this matter, I have made this suggestion while the chairs are so numerously occupied.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I realize the natural anxiety of the Senator from Indiana to proceed with the unfinished business that by an arrangement has been temporarily laid aside each succeeding day, with a view of considering the postal savings-bank bill. I have been assured by Senators who have expressed a desire to be heard on this measure that there is no disposition whatever to avoid a vote. The Senator from Texas [Mr. BAILEY] desires to be heard with reference to the constitutionality or the alleged unconstitutionality of the proposed measure. He is in some doubt as to the day on which he can address the Senate. I was notified this morning that a member of the committee, the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], desires to be heard in favor of the bill at some length, but would not be able to address the Senate until to-morrow. I should be glad, indeed, to have some definite time fixed for a vote, allowing a sufficient number of days for all Senators who desire to speak to be heard. I think all amendments, at least all suggested, save only two, have been disposed of. There is one amendment pending, and another which was offered yesterday evening. Those amendments can be disposed of, I take it, within a week, and all Senators be accorded the privilege of speaking on the measure.

In order to reach an understanding in some definite way upon this point, I now ask unanimous consent that a vote be taken on the postal savings-bank bill and all amendments pending at the time——

Mr. GALLINGER. Pending and to be offered?

Mr. CARTER. Pending and to be offered, at 4 o'clock on Wednesday, one week from to-day.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I can not consent to that, because, unless I change my plan, I must be absent from the Senate until after Wednesday next, and I hardly think now that I shall be prepared, or at least that I would be inclined, to address the Senate until I have returned from the errand on which I go, and which will keep me away until after the date the Senator from Montana names.

Mr. President, if I could prevent a vote on this bill by objection I would do so, and I would take whatever responsibility attached to that course. I recognize that I can not do that, and I am not inclined to engage in a futile attempt. So, if the Senator from Montana will fix the day a week from the time he proposes, I shall offer no objection.

Mr. CARTER. Then, Mr. President, if it is agreeable to all Senators, I make the request for a vote at 4 o'clock on Wednesday, the 23d instant, on the bill and all amendments then pending or to be at that time offered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, our experience has not been a fortunate one when a particular hour is fixed for a vote. It has uniformly happened that when the hour has been specified some Senators have had greatly the advantage of others in the debate closing when many Senators desired to say a few words. I therefore think it much better that merely a day for taking the vote shall be fixed.

Mr. BAILEY. Before we adjourn.

Mr. BACON. A day, rather than an hour.

Mr. BAILEY. That is true.

Mr. BACON. I think that would give everybody a fair chance.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it has been suggested that probably a great many Senators would be absent on the 22d instant, and that, therefore, to return might not be convenient on the 23d.

Mr. BAILEY. Let us make it Friday. That is a good day for work of this kind.

Mr. CARTER. It is all in the point of view.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, I desire to reach a point on which Senators will agree. I suggest that Saturday, the 19th instant, before adjournment, be fixed for a vote on the bill and all amendments then pending.

Mr. HEYBURN. Mr. President, I can not agree at this time to the fixing of that date for a vote on the bill. I have made an engagement for that day to deliver an address, which will take me from the city of Washington early in the day. I merely state that to show that I am not making a captious objection. I am not willing at this time that any day shall be fixed for a vote upon this measure. It is my intention, as soon as I can find time to do so, to formulate an amendment that will be in the nature of a substitute for the bill. The discussion so far has demonstrated the fact that the question is not free from serious embarrassments and difficulties, and I can not at this time consent to the fixing of a day for taking a vote upon this measure.

Mr. BEVERIDGE. Mr. President, that would seem to settle the request for any unanimous consent for any specific day. That being the case, I am not so sure that the Senator will not get his bill through earlier without fixing a time. The omnibus objection of the Senator from Idaho has settled that. I think it only fair to the unfinished business to suggest that, while it will continue, according to agreement made, to be laid aside from day to day without prejudice whenever any Senator desires to speak upon the postal savings-bank bill in order that that bill may be speeded to a conclusion, still if times come when there is no one prepared to take the floor upon that bill, the unfinished business will be pressed.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. HEYBURN] to the pending resolution.

The amendment was rejected.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The question now is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I do not rise to oppose the resolution before the Senate, nor yet to advocate it, but I desire to submit some observations respecting it before it is finally disposed of. I should be pleased if I could proceed, as the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] were permitted to proceed, without interruption until I have completed what I have to say. Thereafter, if any Senator cares to question me, I shall be glad to answer, if I can.

Mr. President, on Friday, January 28, 1910, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] delivered an address from his place in the Senate, based on a resolution which had been presented to the Senate on January 5 by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS], providing for the appointment of a select committee of the Senate to inquire into and report upon the causes for the recent remarkable increases in the prices current for the necessaries of life, and for other purposes. This address of the Senator from Massachusetts was a carefully prepared address, and was delivered from manuscript.

During the course of its delivery the Senator from time to time exhibited different bundles of statistics which he had prepared, or which had been prepared at his instance, and which he offered in support of his argument. He did not read the statistics at the time, but asked and received consent to insert them in the body of his speech. For some inexplicable reason the speech of the Senator did not appear in the RECORD of the following day, and was not printed in the RECORD until Tuesday morning, February 1. Why the Senator found it necessary to withhold for revision a speech so prepared and delivered for a period of four or five days is something rather difficult at first blush to understand. I wonder if it be possible that the Senator was uncertain as to some of his statements or as to some of his statistics, and that he found it necessary to employ several days to revise them before being willing to commit them to cold type? There is another incident in connection with this of somewhat striking significance. As I have said, the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] had, on January 5, introduced a resolution for a select committee of investigation, which resolution, since then, had been lingering for three or four weeks in the committee to which it had been referred, and over which committee the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] presides.

For some unaccountable reason the Senator from West Virginia was unable to secure a report on his resolution from that committee, although he has stated on the Senate floor that he had made almost daily endeavors to have it reported. The Senator from West Virginia had good reason for his belief that an attempt was being made to smother or suppress his resolution for some ulterior purpose. What could be the meaning of this committee procrastination? The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH], the head of the Senate Republican organization, was absent from Washington when the Senator from Massachusetts delivered his speech, and had been absent for some time. He returned to the capital several days after the delivery of the speech referred to and a day or so before its publication. Is it possible that the Senator from Massachusetts withheld his speech that it might be submitted to the Senator from Rhode Island for his approval before it appeared in the RECORD?

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. STONE. I do.

Mr. LODGE. I desire in the fullest way to respect the request of the Senator not to interrupt him, but I think he will allow me to correct him when he is attributing motives to me. The speech to which he refers was never submitted to the Senator from Rhode Island, and I do not think he has ever read it to this day. There was no connection whatever that I know of between his return and the speech. I held the speech out until Monday, which was the first day I could get it in the RECORD, in order that I might collate the tables of figures. There was no change made whatever, but all those figures had to be very carefully collated. That was the sole reason for the delay. It was entirely innocent, and there is no mistake about it at all.

Mr. STONE. Well, Mr. President, there is a well-grounded belief here and throughout the country that the Senator from Rhode Island is at the head of a coterie of powerful Republican Senators who undertake to direct, and do direct, the course of important events in the Senate of the United States. It may be—and the Senator from Massachusetts says it is true, and of course I accept what he says—that he did not desire the seal of approval affixed by the crown chief on his deliverance before it was laid before the public. At all events, the speech appeared in the RECORD the day following the reputed return of the Senator from Rhode Island. Moreover, on the very day after the Senator from Massachusetts caused his address to be published he offered a resolution here providing for a select committee of Senators to investigate the subject of prices, wages, and so forth. It was somewhat narrower in scope, but still in substance similar to the resolution offered by the Senator from West Virginia.

That resolution was referred to the Committee on Finance, of which the Senator from Rhode Island is the chairman and the Senator from Massachusetts a distinguished member, and on the following day, February 3, 1910, it was favorably reported from that committee. Thereupon the resolution was referred to the Committee to Audit the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, so that that committee might inquire into and report upon the question of expense incident to the proposed examination. That committee on yesterday and within four legislative days after the reference of the resolution reported back the resolution now before the Senate. This resolution is reported back as a substitute for the resolution first proposed by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. President, there has been a vast amount of "monkey business"—if I may be excused for using this expressive but not altogether ornate colloquialism—or, in other words, there has been a vast amount of dilly-dallying and delay in connection with this resolution of investigation. I have been puzzled to know the meaning of it. I confess the whole performance hath too much the complexion of a purpose to conceal, rather than a purpose to discover.

Why did the Republican members of the Finance Committee come rushing headlong into this business and exhibit an overweaning anxiety to take charge of the proposed inquiry? If the remarkable things done here have given to this business the sinister aspect of a scheme on the part of certain Senators to organize a committee that would start in primarily to hold the Payne-Aldrich tariff law blameless for the evils the country complains of, then the Senator from Massachusetts and his Republican associates on the Finance Committee have only themselves to blame. Is it the purpose of the great Senators who have thrown themselves into this breach to put the proposed investigation under the control of Senators who were chiefly instrumental in framing the new law and most concerned in exempting it from all responsibility for the higher prices which followed its enactment? A deep-laid apprehension to that effect has been expressed by many newspapers and by many people in different parts of the country. As an example of newspaper comment, I quote the following from the Washington Post of February 3:

> Frankly admitting the fear that a prolonged investigation of the increased cost of living by the Ways and Means Committee of the House, or as provided for by any of the rival resolutions, might drag throughout the summer and work to the disadvantage of the Republicans in the elections next fall, the Senate Finance Committee yesterday formulated a programme for a quick, sharp inquiry of the subject in all its phases. Senator LODGE introduced in the Senate a resolution providing for the appointment of a committee of five Senators to do the work.
> No problem, it is said, has proven so embarrassing to the Republican party. When the majority members of the Finance Committee met yesterday consideration was given to demands from every section of the country that something be done to restore normal prices. Several Senators declared the high prices would be attributed directly to the tariff, and unless something were done to refute these charges the Republican party would be compelled to bear the brunt of the attack.

This is from one of the most intelligently conducted newspapers of the country and a paper whose partiality for the administration is well and widely known. If it be true that the scheme is to exonerate the new tariff law from blame, well and good, for I know of nothing that stands in greater need of a deep-laid coating of whitewash. Would it not be a misnomer to call such a thing an "investigation?" Think of it, Mr. President, a plan projected and organized not for a broad and impartial inquiry, but for the primary purpose of proving that the new tariff law is in no wise responsible for the untoward conditions which have stirred the people to demand both information and relief. If this investigation is to be made by the men who framed and forced this tariff iniquity through Congress, will the investigation be worth the price the taxpayers must pay for it?

I venture to conjecture that our friends who are engineering this business will find it difficult to hoodwink a majority of the American people. They may succeed in doing it, but they will find it a difficult task.

Mr. President, that a material and marked advance has been made in the prices of the necessaries of life, not only in foodstuffs, but in other necessaries, since the Payne-Aldrich law was enacted is so manifest and universally known as to be beyond intelligent dispute. Whether this enhancement in current prices is due in any measure to the tariff may be the subject of dispute, but the fact of the rise in prices since the enactment of the law is beyond the realm of disputation. I see it reported in the press within the last few days that Dr. H. W. Wiley, of the Agricultural Department, is accredited with suggesting at a public hearing before the District Commissioners that the American hen is largely to blame for the increase in the cost of foodstuffs. He is reported as saying that the American hen is being bred for commercial purposes and taught to lay smaller eggs and more of them. He seemed to think the hen might be trained to lay smaller eggs, but he doubted her capacity to materially increase the supply. Yes, Mr. President, the causes for the increase in prices may be problematical, but the fact is indisputable. No doubt there are others like Doctor Wiley who stand ready to accuse the American hen more vehemently than the American tariff.

Again, Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts in his speech explains the rise in prices partly by what he states to be the fact that the demand for commodities has increased without a corresponding increase in production and partly by the fact that the world's gold supply has been augmented beyond the needs of business and the arts. Narrowing the inquiry for the moment to the actual point involved in what I am saying, it certainly will not be contended that any marked difference in demand and supply for commodities in general has occurred since the President signed the new tariff law on August 5, 1909, and therefore the quick rise in prices since that date can not be attributed to that cause. Secondly, while the argument of the Senator respecting the effect on prices of the increased supply of gold in recent years may be well founded, it can not be contended that that cause has operated to any appreciable extent on the increase of prices which immediately followed upon the enactment of the new law. The Senator from Massachusetts made this statement:

> Gold is the standard by which other commodities are measured. If gold grows scarcer and dearer, all other commodities fall in price. If, on the other hand, gold increases more rapidly than the demand of business and the arts requires, it will become cheap and more plentiful, and the prices of all the other commodities which it measures will rise.

I feel sure, Mr. President, that the Senator from Massachusetts must have extracted that quotation from some speech made by Mr. Bryan or some other Democrat during the memorable campaign of 1896. That campaign was anterior to the new discoveries—enormous discoveries—of gold since made in our Western States, in Alaska, Africa, Australia, and elsewhere, and at that time the estimated per capita circulation of the country was far below that of the present. The actual amount of money then supposed to be in the country was little more than one-half what it is supposed to be at this time, even if the whole of our possible circulation at that period had been available.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHIVELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TILLMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Missouri, but I am enjoying this so hugely that I desire our Republican brethren to hear it. I should like to get a quorum here.

Mr. STONE. Please do not do that. Do not stop me. I ask the Senator not to do it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from South Carolina make the point of no quorum?

Mr. STONE. No; he does not.

We Democrats contended at that time that the cause of low prices was not due to the rates of duty imposed by tariff laws—for, in fact, the average rate had not been materially changed for years—but was due chiefly to a gross inadequacy in the volume of available currency. Neither knowing nor anticipating that the early discoveries of new gold deposits, so stupendous as to amaze the world, would be made, we advocated bimetallism as the only apparent remedy for the evils then afflicting the country. We argued then, as the Senator from Massachusetts argues now, that low prices were superinduced by the scarcity of money, and that to increase the volume of standard money would be to increase the value of labor and its products. At last Republican orators are driven to accept Democratic arguments which formerly they denounced as puerile if not idiotic. I agree that in the quotation I have made from the Senator's address he states a sound economic principle, but I deny its applicability when he seeks to use it as an explanation for the advance in prices which has occurred within the last half year and immediately following the enactment of the new tariff schedules. It would be useless, as I have said, for any Senator to deny that prices have been greatly advanced since the passage of the new law. If any Senator makes such denial I will not waste time in joining issue with him.

I will prefer to have his denial read broadcast by the men and women of all the States who have homes to care for and work to do, and leave the answer to them. This much we know: That this universal complaint against the increase of prices has found voice and comes to us in the form of protests since the enactment of the new law.

Mr. President, at the close of the speech made by the Senator from Massachusetts on January 28 the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] took the floor and in an impromptu address sought to controvert—I think with great success—some of the statements made by the Senator from Massachusetts. Among other things the Senator from Georgia sought to show that meats and other food products produced in America were sold cheaper abroad than at home. Instantly the Senator from Massachusetts, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], and others sought to discredit the statement of the Senator from Georgia. That was a strange shifting of positions for our friends on the other side. During the tariff debates last summer, and in other previous debates of like character, our Republican friends quite frankly admitted that American products were sold cheaper in foreign markets than in American markets, and this they partly explained on the ground that these cheaper sales were of surplus products, and that they were made in order to keep our mills going and our artisans employed.

In other words, we were given to understand that our great industrial monopolies were selling abroad at lower prices, even at a loss, purely out of charity and philanthropic motives. But now the contention is made that prices for necessaries abroad are substantially the same as in this country. When the Senator from Georgia contended that there was a wide margin in the difference of cost here and abroad, the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Michigan demanded his authority for the statement. The Senator from Georgia read numerous extracts from reliable journals showing prices upon given commodities in this country, in Canada, and in Europe, and thereupon the Senator from Massachusetts joined issue with the Senator from Georgia and told the Senator from Georgia that he had and would publish statistics in his address, taken from the reports of consuls, commercial bodies, and other sources that would prove the contention of the Senator from Georgia to be erroneous. Have we then come to the pass when Republicans are driven into the contention that it costs as much to live in Canada and the principal countries in Europe as it does to live in America?

To admit that, as it now seems to be admitted, is to throw away one of the pet arguments with which protectionists have been wont to delude the American people, namely, that one commanding need for a higher scale of wages in America is due to the alleged fact that the cost as well as the standard of living in this country is also higher. Mr. President, I have no volume of carefully and prudently selected statistics now at hand, such as the Senator from Massachusetts had prepared for him, to prove that American productions are sold cheaper abroad than at home. I had not supposed that that would be seriously controverted. There is one thing, however, that I wish to lay before the Senate in this connection. On January 24, ultimo, the Hon. James Wilson, Secretary of Agriculture, appeared before a subcommittee of the House Committee on the District of Columbia, which was engaged upon an inquiry relating to increased prices and their causes. He said that his department had been prosecuting an investigation into that subject. Among other things, he said:

> We inquired into the prices that the farmer gets on the farm to ascertain whether the farmer was getting all the money of the country for the sale of his meats. We found that the stock steer on the farm, a 2-year-old steer, is not a particle dearer now than it was twelve years ago. You can buy them just as cheap now as you could have bought them twelve years ago. Good ones can be bought at 4 cents a pound; good ones, stock steers, weighing 800 pounds.
> Mr. WILEY. A gentleman whom we all know, a Member of Congress, raises fat veal for market. He says he is getting this year 1 cent less than last year, and yet, here in the District, the price of veal has advanced from 25 to 30 per cent.
>
> Secretary WILSON. Yes. We all know these things, we on the outside, but we have not the power that you have.
>
> Mr. WILEY. I may say that it is Mr. GARDNER, of Atlantic City, to whom I refer. He tells us that.
>
> Secretary WILSON. The American people have always had the cheapest food in the world up until lately.
> I am gathering the facts to show that the food products you see here, grown on the American farm, are sold cheaper abroad than they are sold in the United States. I will get the facts and have them printed. I will repeat that: The food products of the American farmer are being sold in foreign countries, some of them that I know of, to the consumer abroad for less prices than they are being sold for to consumers here.

Mr. President, I presume that this proposed select committee if created will have the Senator from Massachusetts at its head, or at least a part of its membership. He is a very able, adroit, and discriminating gentleman. If he is on the committee, I wonder if he will strive to get at the facts Secretary Wilson says he is striving to secure? Judging by the Senator's speech and his known opinions and partialities, if he should follow the line of inquiry he would naturally prefer, I doubt if he would seek zealously to discover facts that would compel him to make a report corroborating the Secretary of Agriculture.

It goes almost without the saying that the Senator from Massachusetts, and those who think as he thinks and feel as he feels, would infinitely prefer to have the investigation disclose a situation that would more nearly comport with the views expressed by the Senator from Massachusetts in the carefully prepared speech he withheld for several days to be revised. Mr. President, such an investigation to have any economic value should be impartially conducted with a view to honest results, and not conducted in a partisan spirit for partisan effect.

Mr. President, I have said that it would be a work of supererogation and a practical waste of time to undertake to prove that prices have materially increased since the enactment of the new tariff law. Nevertheless, with the view, not of proving but of emphasizing the fact, I will advert to one or two things which seem to me to be singularly pertinent. It is not proper to confine this inquiry to meats and breadstuffs. There are other things almost as necessary to human comfort and human existence as things to eat, and so I would broaden the inquiry so as to enter into a larger field of production and of prices, especially as relates to what we term the necessaries of life. The New York Journal of Commerce, a trades paper of recognized authority, last month contained a dispatch from Philadelphia, the integrity of which it vouches for, and from which I quote as follows:

> With the price of hosiery and underwear already 50 per cent higher than it was a year ago, the manufacturers of the country have just decided to put on another 25 per cent, so that, as they say, they can get some profit out of the business.
> Not only does the 50 per cent increase apply to these two textile products, but it has been made also in every line of textiles in the manufacture of which cotton is used. And the additional advance agreed upon will also apply to cotton goods of all sorts.
> A gentlemen's agreement to make these advances effective was put through on Monday in New York at a conference between representatives of the National Association of Hosiery and Underwear Manufacturers and the Wholesale Dry Goods Association. While the manufacturers who attended the conference and the several mill owners from this city who were in attendance were careful to make plain the fact that no price increase had been ordered, such will be the effect of their ultimatum.
> They can not, under their articles of agreement in the national organization, "cut each other's throats," under penalty of drastic action on the part of the association directorate. In the organization, which has its headquarters and principal offices in this city, are about 80 per cent of the hosiery and underwear manufacturers of the United States, so that the action taken at the conference will be far-reaching.

During the consideration of the Payne-Aldrich bill it was charged over and again by those of us opposing its enactment that its passage would have the almost immediate effect of advancing the already high prices on numerous commodities regarded as common necessities. Without quoting from Democrats, as I could by columns, I will quote an utterance from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], made in a speech on June 9, 1909. He said:

> We are about to pass a bill at this session that will impose additional burdens upon the consumers of the country. They asked for relief. This bill will increase the cost of living in every home in the land.

That prophecy has been speedily realized.

As early as November and December last, I made numerous inquiries as to prices of merchants in person and by letter. Among others I addressed a letter to Mr. Murray Carleton, of St. Louis, president of the Carleton Dry Goods Company, of that city, one of the largest wholesale dry-goods establishments in the Middle West, making inquiry of him as to the effect of the new law on prices in the lines handled by his house. Mr. Carleton is one of the most intelligent and conservative merchants in the country, and there is no man upon whose statements more implicit reliance can be placed. He replied to my letter at some length, saying that he had written it after consulting with other merchants. He gave me a list of different kinds and qualities of cotton goods which had been advanced from 12½ to over 33 per cent since the passage of the new law. He also gave me a list of men's, women's, and children's cotton underwear, which had been advanced from about 7½ to 15 per cent.

Concerning linens, he said that since the passage of the new law the cost on about 70 per cent of his purchases had advanced about 7½ per cent and on about 15 per cent of his purchases the advances were approximately 10 per cent. He further said that on the class of goods described as "white goods," of which ladies' waists, and so forth, are manufactured, and on lawns and the like, there had been an advance of 5 to 8 per cent; and that on cotton towels there have been advances averaging about 12½ per cent, depending upon the character of the merchandise, and an advance on laces and embroideries of about 5 per cent. On hosiery he said the advances made to that time were about 10 per cent, and that this applied especially to the cheaper grades used by the masses.

The Rice-Stix Dry Goods Company, of St. Louis, is also one of the largest establishments of its kind in the Central West. That company on December 16, answering my inquiry, transmitted to me certain tables showing advances in the prices of certain goods since the enactment of the Payne-Aldrich law. I ask leave to insert so much of these tables as is pertinent to the immediate subject I am discussing as a part of my remarks, without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

DECEMBER 16, 1909.

	2.21	2.48
	2.59	2.86
	3.34	3.55
Men's cotton and jersey gloves	.72	1.17½
	1.26	1.65
	1.62	1.98

White goods department.

Embroideries and handkerchiefs bought in currency at a landed price[a]	60	60	2

[a] Duty has not been changed, but an administrative act forces manufacturers to add extra percentage to cost of goods.

Wash fabric department.

Since the new tariff on foreign colored wash fabrics imported to this country, the schedule has advanced on all lines of cotton goods on account of the increase in duty. The advance is greatest on raised figures, which enter into the construction of nearly all fancy wash fabrics.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, cotton fabrics are almost as necessary to human comfort as bread and meat.

Mr. Carleton also wrote me that on dress goods made of wool, or of part wool and part cotton, the merchants had then made few purchases since the enactment of the new law, for the reason that their purchases of such goods for the fall and winter trade were made prior to its enactment. However, Mr. Carleton sent me a copy of a letter addressed to him by a gentleman whom he described as "one of the most intelligent buyers of dress goods in the United States." This gentleman stated that he had made no purchases of consequence since the passage of the Payne-Aldrich law, but he expressed the opinion that advances would appear. I quote the following extract from his letter:

> We have paid an advance of 2½ to 5 per cent on some lines of domestic dress goods, but the commission houses claim that the advances are due to the advance in wool and not to the change in the tariff bill.

Of course. You may be sure that these manufacturers will be smart enough to devise some excuse for higher prices and to assign some cause for it over which they have no control and which leaves them helpless and blameless. It is not to be imagined that the men who swarmed upon Washington to clamor for increased rates and to protest against reductions would take the blame for higher prices upon themselves. Mr. Carleton also sent an "announcement," dated October 16, 1909, sent out by a large concern engaged in the manufacture of knit goods, informing their customers that they would be obliged to withdraw all quotations for any further orders for 1909 delivery at the current quoted prices. The merchants are told that because of the higher cost of wages and raw material this manufacturing concern would not be able in future to sell at the prevailing quotations. Here again the blame for increases is cast upon other shoulders. Reflect that these proposed advances on knit goods are made on fabrics covered by a protective duty of from 95 per cent to 141 per cent, and ponder that well when you read the transparent excuses made for the increases. Here are manufacturers making goods sheltered by a practically prohibitive tariff pretending that they must advance the price of their products for some extraneous reason beyond their control. Is it possible that there are people so dull as to be further hoodwinked by such tommy rot? Is it possible that any sane man can doubt that manufacturers are taking advantage of the new law to advance prices for greater profits? Remember that the Payne-Aldrich bill was passed by Congress and signed by the President on the 5th day of August last and that these marked increases in price almost immediately followed the enactment of that law. The case is too plain for argument.

At this point I will revert to that provision of the Republican platform declaring that tariff duties should be made high enough to cover the difference in the cost of production between this and foreign countries. What constitutes this difference? The Republican platform itself answers that question, as did Mr. Taft during the campaign. It was declared by both that a duty sufficiently high to measure the difference in cost of production was a duty that should be high enough to cover, first, the difference in labor wage, and, second, high enough also to insure a reasonable profit to the manufacturer. The fact is that the only essential difference in the actual cost of production here and in other leading industrial countries is the difference in the labor wage. So far as the amount of capital invested, allowances for interest and depreciation, cost of fuel, and raw material are concerned—or, in other words, as far as the ordinary expenses of operation outside of labor are concerned—it may be fairly asserted that the manufacturers of the United States and of the leading countries of Europe, such as Great Britain and Germany, are practically on a footing of equality. At the same time it is true that the American standard of daily wage is the highest in the world. It is equally true that the American wage-earner pays far more than any other wage-earner in the way of living expenses. I agree that the daily wage paid to American workingmen is the highest paid in any country; yet, taken all in all, the American labor employer gets far better results from his labor than does his foreign competitor; and hence, when the labor cost of production is scientifically measured, the difference is far less than the mere difference in daily wage. I could quote from numerous authorities in support of this statement, but I content myself with a brief quotation from Mr. Schwab, who was educated and fitted for his remarkable career by Andrew Carnegie. He said:

> I have been in contact with labor of all kinds for years, and I know what I can do. I know that American laborers can produce more steel in a given time than any other workmen in the world. * * * It is true that we have to pay our workmen more; you always have to pay the most skillful workmen the highest wages. The Americans are the best workmen on earth. The highest-paid laborer is the cheapest to the employer.

And here, speaking of this labor question, I want to say that a world of mistakes and misapprehensions have crept in upon the public mind regarding it. That there is a difference in the wage paid American workmen and European workmen is undeniable. If it were not so, God only knows how the American workmen could live, paying the enormously higher prices they do for whatever they consume. Yes; there is an appreciable difference in the day's wage, but even that difference is by no means as great as those who advocate protective-tariff laws pretend. A systematic scheme of false education upon this subject has been in progress for years, both in and out of Congress.

Now, Mr. President, let me give some instances of "reasonable profits" earned by some of our New England industrial philanthropists. Many of these were referred to during the debate last summer. Indeed, this whole subject was gone over then, but I do not think it amiss to recall the facts:

First, I will take four leading cotton mills in New Bedford, Mass. Under the laws of Massachusetts, corporations of this kind are required to make public report of their capital stock, surplus, dividends, etc.; and their stocks are dealt in—that is, bought and sold—through certain agencies. The principal agent handling the stocks of these New Bedford companies is the firm of Sanford & Kelly, bankers of that city, and these bankers issue periodical statements relating to them. From these statements, which I have seen and from which I collated a mass of information, I found that in 1907 and 1908 the Acushnet Mills, with a capital stock of $500,000; the City Manufacturing Company, with a capital stock of $750,000; the Pierce Manufacturing Company, with a capital stock of $600,000; and the Dartmouth Manufacturing Company, with a capital stock of $600,000, paid dividends as follows: In 1907, an average dividend of 34.7 per cent, and in 1908, following the beginning of and during the panic, a dividend of 25.2 per cent on their entire capital stock; and this does not include profits transferred to the surplus funds of the companies.

Fall River is another manufacturing center of Massachusetts. The same law as to publishing reports and the same practice as to the sale and purchase of stocks obtain at Fall River as at New Bedford. I examined statements issued by Edwin J. Cole, banker and broker, No. 8 South Main street, Fall River, Mass., showing the capitalization, surplus, dividends, and market value of the stocks of a number of manufacturing companies at that place. The Troy Cotton and Woolen Manufactory, capitalized at $300,000, with a surplus of $366,529.28, paid a dividend in 1907 of 67 per cent, and its shares of stock, having a par value of $100, had a quoted market value of $330. The Border City Manufacturing Company, with a capital of $1,000,000 and surplus of $107,266.54, in 1907 earned a net profit aggregating 37.5 per cent, and paid in dividends to the stockholders 23½ per cent, the remaining going to the surplus. The stocks of this company, with a par value of $100, were quoted as having a market value of $150. The Union Cotton Manufacturing Company, with a capital stock of $1,200,000 and a surplus of $572,544.66, in 1907 earned net profits aggregating 46 per cent, and out of that paid dividends amounting to 35½ per cent, adding the remainder to the surplus. The $100 shares of this corporation's stock were quoted at $195. I have a record of nine companies altogether doing business at Fall River, but I will not go through the whole of them. Suffice it to say that the average dividend actually paid in 1907 by these nine companies was 25½ per cent, although their net earnings were much larger, all earnings above the dividends declared going into the surplus funds of the respective companies, and the average selling price of the stocks of all these companies on January 1, 1909, of $100 shares, was $178.66.

During the last nine years the Pepperell Manufacturing Company, of Biddeford, Me., has declared dividends averaging 24 per cent. In 1905 its dividends were 47 per cent, and in 1906 62 per cent. The Bates Manufacturing Company, of Lewiston, Me., capitalized at $1,200,000, with a surplus of $1,100,000, had net earnings in 1907 amounting to 41.87 per cent and declared a dividend of 35 per cent. The Great Falls Cotton Manufacturing Company, of Somersworth, N. H., capitalized at $1,500,000, with a surplus of $987,000, had net earnings in 1907 of 21 per cent. The American Linen Company, a Massachusetts corporation, in 1907 had net earnings of 30 per cent, 11 per cent being paid in dividends and the remainder transferred to the surplus. The Sagamore Manufacturing Company in 1906 had net earnings of 48½ per cent and declared a dividend of 30 per cent. The Algonquin Printing Company, organized in 1893 and capitalized for $500,000, had in 1907 a surplus of $750,000. During the last nine years its net earnings have aggregated 607 per cent, or six times the entire amount of the capital invested. Its average annual dividend to its stockholders during the last nine years has amounted to 67½ per cent.

Numerous other instances substantially of like nature could be cited, but in heaven's name this is enough. In the face of this showing, the facts of which are known partly through official sources and partly through the authorized advertisements of bankers and brokers, these manufacturers had the audacity to demand of the Congress that they should not reduce the rates of duty already provided, but in most instances clamored to have the rates increased. The demands of these cormorants were for the most part acceded to and written into the law. Take the cotton mills of New England for example. Several of the mills I have named are engaged in manufacturing cotton fabrics. The corporations conducting these industries, paying the exorbitant dividends I have indicated, with surplus funds almost equal and in some cases exceeding the capital stock, and with their stocks quoted in the markets at two or three times their par value, not content with all this as 'a reasonable profit,' sent representatives to the capital to urge an increase in the tariff rates on cotton goods, and Congress obsequiously advanced the rates from about 45 to 50 per cent throughout the schedule.

Mr. President, every man of common sense knows, or ought to know, that the enormous profits accruing to investors in these industries are the result of artificial conditions created, in part at least, by law. I do not see how it can be contended that these artificial conditions from which the consumers of the country have at last become the impatient sufferers are chiefly for the benefit of American wage-earners employed in protected manufacturing industries. I will not now discuss to what extent, if any, all things considered, the onerous burdens imposed on importations benefit employees in manufacturing industries; but I assert, with the greatest confidence, that the tariff rates, as a rule, are far in excess of any difference in the labor wage in America and the chief competing countries of Europe; and I assert with equal confidence that the chief beneficiaries of this system are the men who employ this labor, as the chief sufferers are the consumers who are the victims of their monopolies, the so-called "protected" wage-earners suffering alike with others.

Mr. President, I will not contend that the tariff is the sole cause of exorbitant prices, but I do insist that a practically prohibitive tariff, such as we have, is at least one of the chief causes that make exorbitant prices for human necessities a possibility. In the testimony given by Secretary Wilson before the House subcommittee to which I have referred he was asked whether he thought that the lower prices of American productions in foreign countries was due to any excess of supply in this country. He answered:

> No; I wish you would find out what it is due to. I believe it is due to combinations, miserable little trusts, found in every town in the land.

It may be that trusts and combinations put up prices—I think they do—but at the same time I believe the old contention to be true—that a high-protective tariff is the mother of trusts. I do not mean to affirm that a commercial combination is impossible independent of a protective tariff, for there may be, and sometimes is, a peculiar and exceptional condition where such a combination may be organized without regard to a tariff. Nevertheless, it follows that where outside competition is prohibited or rendered hazardous and ineffective by exorbitant tariff rates, there is no security for the home consumer except in home competition. And equally is it true that whenever foreign competition is practically excluded the opportunity is at once presented and made comparatively easy for such domestic combinations as will in effect destroy home competition. Moreover, if such a tariff duty does not enhance the selling price of a domestic production, then it is in no sense protective, and in that view we might as well proceed unanimously to levy duties solely to produce a public revenue.

But, Mr. President, every duty, high or low, is protective. Even a reasonable duty, even a duty such as Republicans in earlier days contended for—that is, a duty just high enough to cover the difference in labor wage here and abroad—is protective; and the higher the level of the duties rise the more protective it becomes, even until it may reach the point of absolute prohibition. With foreign competition excluded or heavily burdened, and with domestic competition destroyed by combinations, a high protective tariff attains the supreme height of its possibilities for good or evil, as you wish.
